B'NAI B'RITH NEWS

BENEVOLENCE BROTHERLY LOVE AND HARMONY

Vol. X SEPTEMBER, 1917 No. 1

Entered as second-class matter September 16, 1913, at the post office at Chicago, Illinois, under the act of August 24, 1912.

THE AMERICAN SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' WELFARE LEAGUE OF THE INDEPENDENT ORDER OF B'NAI B'RITH

During the summer and fall of 1916 thousands of soldiers were called to the Mexican border to protect the country against an invasion from Mexico. Among those were a great many Jews, and almost before they knew it, the Jewish citizens of the border towns found themselves attending to the social, material and even spiritual needs of our men in uniform. Among the first to take up this necessary work were local congregations and B'nai B'rith lodges. The Jewish soldiers were invited to services and were extended hospitality in the homes of Jews; one city, El Paso, found it necessary and expedient to rent a down-town store as a club room; another, San Antonio, offered its temple as headquarters.

As early as last summer, requests came into the offices of the Order asking that it take upon itself the duty of systematizing the work, but the Executive Committee felt that local lodges could cope with the problem as long as the matter did not assume a national character.

After Congress declared the existence of a state of war with Germany, the question of the care of Jewish soldiers again came to the front. When the locations of the various army camps were announced a number of lodges in the cities in or near which such camps were to be located, requested that the Order undertake the work of "soldier service" along lines similar to that of the Y. M. C. A. Before the matter could be brought before the Executive Committee, lodges in various parts of the United States began to perfect plans for welfare service for soldiers.

On July 29th and 30th, the Executive Committee of the Order met in Chicago. It considered these requests from the various lodges and from many individuals. The question of the necessity for social service work among the soldiers was earnestly discussed. It was recognized that it was both a patriotic duty and a religious obligation to see to it that while away from their homes Jewish soldiers received that attention which loyal and patriotic Jewish citizens ought to bestow upon them. The breaking of home ties often throws soldiers into a homesickness which imperils their usefulness; the new life that they lead in the camp often dulls the sense of a family solidarity; and the lack of proper guidance outside of the camp, in many cases, gives men a freedom which is converted into license. Not all men are similarly affected; some feel the change one way, others feel it in another way. The point to consider is that the life of the man in uniform who has not been accustomed to military routine made abnormal by the change must be made as normal as the situation will permit.

Aside from this consideration of soldiers' welfare, the Executive Committee foresaw the dependency that in many cases would result from the taking away of the breadwinners or those who aided in supporting families and the Order could render service in helping to care for such dependents. Again, the experience of Europe has taught us that many of the soldiers will need to commence life over again; they will have to be re-educated; their whole lives will have to be readjusted; for there are bound to be many who will lose limbs, lose their sight and their hearing. The certainty of all of the above facts impressed the Executive Committee with the necessity of an organization within the Order, fully equipped to be of service not only to the men in line, but also to their dependents. While there were plans under consideration by other national organizations along soldier welfare lines, the Executive Committee of the Order had not been made cognizant of any concerted effort to carry them out. The demand for welfare work among soldiers was strong and consistent and since its fulfillment was uncertain, the Order assumed this important work. Accordingly the resolutions printed elsewhere on this page were unanimously adopted. In accordance with this resolution, a Committee of Fifteen with power to increase its number was appointed to carry out its purposes. This committee consists of representatives from the American districts and additional members, residents of Chicago, so as to assure at all times a working majority. This committee, known as the Managing Board, at present composed of the following: Sigmund Livingston, Bloomington, Ill., chairman; Samuel Alsculer, Chicago; Harry S. Bloomberg, Richmond; Louis J. Borinstein, Indianapolis; Henry Dannenbaum, Houston; Samuel Folz, Kalamazoo; Isadore M. Golden, San Francisco; Dr. Herbert S. Goldstein, New York; Moses E. Greenebaum, Chicago, treasurer; Adolf Kraus, Chicago, president of the Order ex-Officio; Gerson B. Levi, Chicago, secretary; Julius H. Meyer, Chicago; Toby Rubovits, Chicago; Benjamin Samuels, Chicago; Israel Shrimski, Chicago; Isador Sobel, Erie; Edward Sonnenschein, Chicago; and Leon Zolotkoff, Chicago, met and organized the "American Soldiers and Sailors Wellfare League of the I. O. B. B.". The committee elected Dr. George Fox of Ft. Worth, Texas, excutive and field secretary.

Immediately after organization, every lodge in the Order was communicated with. In spite of the fact that many lodges were not meeting during the summer, the response was encouraging. Special letters were sent to the lodges in those cities in or near which camps were to be located, calling upon them to organize and prepare themselves for soldier service. An appeal for funds to the Jews of America, as printed elsewhere on this page, was issued.

The plan of organization outlined by the Managing Board for every local community in which there is a camp calls for the creation of a general committee representaive of every Jewish organization in the community, to be known as the ——— Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare Committee, and the following sub-committees:

(a) A Committee on Headquarters and Workers.

(b) A Finance Committee, to collect funds for the conduct of the work.

(c) A Committee on Entertainment and Hospitality, to furnish entertainments, amusements, and other functions for soldiers; to encourage home hospitality, to look after the general social welfare of the men in uniform; and to compile lists of reputable rooming houses for the visiting relatives of soldiers.

(d) A Committee on Religious Welfare, to furnish opportunities for, and to encourage divine worship.

(e) A Committee on Emergency Relief, to assist the soldiers or their dependents, or those visiting them, who may happen to be in temporary distress, and to keep in touch with the families of the soldiers in case of the latter's illness or neglect.

Up to date the Managing Board has undertaken soldier welfare work at the following camps:

Camp Dodge, Des Moines, Iowa.

Under the auspices of Des Moines Lodge No. 330, a meeting of representatives of all local organizations was held for the purpose of forming an organization to be known as the Des Moines Branch of the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League. Mr. Meyer B. Silverman was chosen president and Mr. Robert Lappen, secretary.

The committee which met was very enthusiastic and pledged a minimum amount of $1,500.00 per year towards the work. The Managing Board undertook to supply the social worker, pay his salary and take care of other expenses that would be necessary for the upkeep of the headquarters at Camp Dodge.

Mr. Joseph Woolf, who is an experienced social worker, has been selected to take care of the work at Des Moines, and he has already departed for his field of activity.

It is estimated that at least $3,000.00 per year will be necessary for the maintenance of this recreational center.

Camp Grant, Rockford, Ill.

At Rockford, Ill., where Camp Grant is located, a meeting of the Jewish citizens with representatives of the league was held and plans for maintaining a headquarters in Rockford were perfected.

The Jewish community of Rockford, though very small, pledged a minimum of $50.00 per month, while the league has undertaken to pay for the worker and all other incidental expenses, including furnishings for the headquarters.

It is expected that within a few days the social worker will be on the ground to administer to the wants of the many Jewish soldiers expected to be at that point.

Holiday services will be held at Rockford and the community is making arrangements to have all of the Jewish soldiers who so desire to worship with them.

Camp Custer, Battle Creek, Mich.

An enthusiastic meeting of the delegates of nearly all of the Michigan lodges was held at Battle Creek, where Camp Custer is located, on Sunday, September 2nd.

The propaganda work done by Brothers Jacob Miller and Sam Folz resulted in a gathering of some thirty delegates. All of these were enthusiastic for the work and the Michigan Branch of the league was organized with the following officers: Sam Folz, Kalamazoo, president; Jacob Miller of Detroit, vice-president; Selig Stern, Kalamazoo, secretary; August Katt, Kalamazoo, treasurer. Rabbis Franklin and Hirschman of Detroit and Abrams of Kalamazoo were appointed a committee to procure a minister for the holidays.

The Michigan Branch was authorized to draw on the Managing Board for the expenses incidental to holding services. It is expected that the maintenance at Camp Custer will be at least $5,000.00 per year and the Michigan lodges have undertaken to maintain this camp themselves. The executive committee of the Michigan branch consists of representatives to be appointed from the individual lodges.

Camp Meade, Washington, D. C.

The Managing Board has approprited $100.00 per month for the present for Washington, where the lodge has turned its headquarters over to the Jewish soldiers for club house purposes. The Washington headquarters is one of the best equipped in the country, offering, besides all of the regular club room privileges, lodging quarters for those who desire to remain at the club over night.

The league has just commenced its work at this point and the importance of its task in Washington can be judged by the following excerpt from a letter from the Hon. Milton Strasburger, one of the National Representatives of the league at Washington:

"Approximately 100,000 soldiers will be quartered in the vicinity of Washington, and I believe the B'nai B'rith will have the opportunity to render a noble and patriotic service in carrying out its plans to cater to the welfare of the soldier. This character of work has the sanction of the Federal Government, and will doubtless be watched with interest.

WHEREAS, It is the mission of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith "to inculcate the purest principles of philanthropy, honor and patriotism"; and

WHEREAS, Large numbers of Jews have volunteered and are in the various branches of the United States Army and Navy Service; therefore be it

RESOLVED, That the order deems it its duty to assist in caring for the spiritual, social and material needs of soldiers and sailors and their dependent families; and be it further

RESOLVED, That a committee of fifteen be appointed by the president of the order, which committee is to proceed to mature plans for the carrying out of the spirit of this resolution. Such plans shall include appointment of subcommittees in each district. Whereupon there shall be available and are hereby appropriated as a nucleus of a fund to be hereafter raised, such sums out of the treasury of the order as are not already otherwise appropriated.

YOUR CALL TO SERVE.

Our boys are in uniform ready to sacrifice their lives, if need be, for our country. Every family either has or soon will have its representative in the forces of the United States.

We have a paternal and patriotic duty to fulfill. The least that we can do is to assist in making the existence of the men in the cantonments more agreeable, and the severance of their home ties less burdensome. Within the camp the men are safe, but away from the camp, will they "Turn to the Right"? What of the welfare of these, our sons and brothers? Who is there to extend the hand of fellowship and to offer the cheer of hospitality? Would you not have less concern: would not some loving mother's anxious heart be comforted if you and she had the assurance that wherever the boy may be, he would have kindly advice, proper guidance, and solicitous friends?

The B'nai B'rith has organized the AMERICAN SOLDIERS' & SAILORS' WELFARE LEAGUE, and has undertaken the task of attending to the spiritual, social and material needs of the men in each of the cantonments. It is our intention to establish recreation rooms outside of the camps, offering entertainments, lectures, and facilitating normal social intercourse: obtaining invitations for the boys to visit the homes of our co-religionists, and furnishing opportunities for divine worship.

There are more than thirty cantonments. We have already instituted our work at three camps and expect soon to extend this work to others. Our work has the approbation of the authorities in Washington. The Y. M. C. A. has raised many millions of dollars for similar purposes. The Catholic order, Knights of Columbus, has now more than one million dollars of the five million dollars it seeks. The extent of our work and the success of our undertaking depends upon you. You have given freely to the war sufferers abroad. Local charities have not lacked your support. Money is a prerequisite to the work in hand. WE NEED AT LEAST A MILLION DOLLARS. You, who have not been, and will not be called to the colors, have repeatedly asked: "What can I do for my country"? Patriotism is evidenced by deeds, not words. Here is your opportunity to serve.

We solicit your financial assistance for this work. Make all checks payable to Mr. M. E. Greenebaum, Treasurer, and forward them care Greenebaum Sons Bank & Trust Co., 9 South La Salle St., Chicago, Ill. All contributions will be acknowledged in the B'nai B'rith News.

American Lake, Tacoma, Wash.

In answer to the request to organize a branch of the league, Tacoma Lodge No. 741 reported that their committee had already met and were looking for headquarters. Upon receipt of this information, the Managing Board wired the lodge that it had appropriated $100.00 per month and that it would increase its appropriation as soon as the financial conditions of the league would warrant.

Camp Shelby, Hattiesburg, Miss.

Hattiesburg Lodge organized in that city a branch of the league and the Managing Board thereupon appropriated $250.00 for furnishings and $100.00 per month towards a social worker.

It is hoped within a wee kor ten days to have the proper man for Camp Shelby in Hattiesburg.

Mr. Herman Katz is secretary of the Hattiesburg branch.

Other Branches.

Branches of the league have been organized at Camp Bowie, Ft. Worth, Texas; Camp Sheridan, Montgomery, Ala.; Camp McArthur, Waco, Texas; Camp Wheeler, Macon, Ga.; and Camp Upton, near Patchogue, N. Y.

Negotiations are now in progress whereby the camps at Alexandria, La.; Chillicothe, Ohio; Little Rock, Ark.; San Antonio, Texas; Houston, Texas; and Deming, New Mexico, will be taken care of.

In Atlanta, Ga., Petersburg, Va., and Louisville, Ky., the lodges have joined with representatives of other organizations in formulating plans for the care of the Jewish soldiers.

A number are entertained every Sunday for meals and then given some form of amusement. The officers of the club have made this organization the headquarters of the soldiers and sailors in Chicago.

The league in conjunction with the Council of Jewish Women and the Chicago Rabbinical Association has issued invitations to the Jewish soldiers at Ft. Sheridan, the Great Lakes Naval Training Station and the Grant Park Camps, not only to attend services in the various synagogues and temples, but to partake of home hospitality. Cards have been issued on which the soldiers are to indicate what kind of worship they wish to attend, whether they wish invitations to private homes for meals and for lodgings.

It is expected that a number of the soldiers and sailors will take advantage of these invitations and spend the holidays amid home surroundings.

Advisory Board.

In view of the extensiveness of the work and the enthusiasm which it has created, it has heen deemed expedient to call in the assistance of many workers of the Order well known in their particular districts and states.

After much consideration an advisory hoard is being named which thus far consists of the following members: Victor Abraham, Cincinnati; Morris Abeles, Leavenworth; Milton Anfenger, Denver; Herman Asher, New York; I. J. Aschheim, San Francisco; Clarence G. Bachrach, Brooklyn; M. L. Bear, Pensacola; Dr. Moise Bergman, Albuquerque; Ernest Bernstein, Sheveport, La.; David Bortin, Philadelphia; Rabbi I. Caplan, Jacksonville; A. D. Engelsman, Oklahoma City; Herbert T. Ezekiel, Richmond; Charles H. Feidelson, Savannah; Marcus Feuchtwanger, New Castle, Pa.; Hiram D. Frankel, St. Paul; Myron M. Goldman, New Orleans; Victor Hexter, Dallas; Joseph Hirsh, Vicksburg; Aaron Hoffman, Charleston; Frederick Jay, Newark, N. J.; A. A. Joseph, Goldsboro, N. C.; Dr. Bernard M. Kaplan, New York; Sol. E. It is thought by many that [illegible] of the I. O. B. B. is one of the most important ever undertaken by the Order. An efficient beginning has been made and the response is hearty.

It is confidently hoped by the officers of both the I. O. B. B. and the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League that every Jew who is able will help the league financially as an expression both of his loyalty to his faith and his patriotic feeling towards his country.

CO-OPERATION IN SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' WELFARE WORK.

To avoid duplication of effort and to increase the efficiency of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work and the American Soldiers and Sailors Welfare League, an agreement for full co-operation has been arrived at between said organizations which is fully explained [illegible] lowing telegrams:

LONDON POST DIRECTS ATTACK AGAINST ENGLISH JEWS.

An article reflecting upon the Jews of England appeared in the Morning Post of London on July 10th.

The article is obviously written, though not specifically so stated, to discredit Edwin Montagu, who was offered the portfolio of minister of reconstruction, a new position created in the British Cabinet for the rebuilding of British industry after the war.

The Post makes the statement that Jews, because of their dual citizenship and because of their specific Jewish interests, are disqualified to hold high governmental positions. The Post states further that it is in the interest of the Jews themselves not to push themselves forward to high governmental positions because it serves only to create bad blood such as was the case with Lord Reading, chief justice of England, and in order to avoid that it very meekly suggests that Jews keep in the background.

It is therefore respectfully requested that you, without unnecessary delay, take action along the following lines.

"At the next meeting of the national officers or executive board of your organization a circular letter, to be sent to all your sub-lodges should be decided upon, calling their attention to the secretary's statement and to the fact, that to financially support the government is a patriotic duty, that a Liberty Loan Committee be immediately appointed and that notification of such action, together with the names and addresses of this committee, be sent to you and also to the Bureau of Publicity of the treasury at Washington.

"If desired this bureau stands ready to send such letters, issued by you, from here upon receipt of your copy and your mailing list. TREASURY DEPARTMENT

Office of the Secretary
"Washington, D. C.

"To Clubs, Societies, Organizations, etc., of the United States of America.

"The response to the first call for two billions of Liberty Loan Bonds has been an emphatic and convincing demonstration of the unity of purpose, among all of the people of the United States, in this war for the defense of American rights and the establishment of a permanent peace.

"Americans of foreign birth or extraction, individually as well as through their organizations, participated in a manner which was the source of much gratification to me.

"The Government will soon be called upon to seek additional credit. In this we must not fail. Like one gigantic unit with an enthusiasm, a willingness, a determination unprecedented, the American people must heed this call. They must do it regardless of creed, regardless of party, regardless of sex, regardless of age and regardless of birth or descent.

"It is only through well organized, thoroughly systematized, and thereby nationally concentrated efforts, that this can be achieved.

"I therefore most earnestly bespeak the enlistment of every club, society, and organization in the coming campaign for the 'Second Liberty Loan of 1917'.

B'NAI B'RITH BOYS' SUMMER CAMP

The first summer camp conducted by the Central B'nai B'rith Council of Chicago was a decided success. In co-operation with the Young Men's Associated Charities a camp was maintained at Long Lake, Ill., where 375 boys were each provided with a two weeks' vacation. The fees were moderate enough to permit the poorest boys to take advantage of the camp, and in many instances where the boy could not afford it the fee was refunded entirely.

The camp was located on the ridge overlooking Long Lake, which provided excellent facilities for rowing and swimming. A swimming instructor gave his entire time to teaching each boy how to swim. Rowing, bathing, baseball, hikes, fishing and boat trips furnished some of the recreation. Around the camp fire each night the boys sang songs, told stories and related experiences. Each morning there was flag raising and each evening the flag was lowered, the boys standing at attention. One hour each day was set aside for military drill. This was optional with the boys.

Good wholesome food was furnished in sufficient quantity to satisfy each one of the eighty hungry boys who gathered around the table at each meal. Fresh milk and eggs were supplied by the neighboring farmers, fresh meat was shipped in rom the Chicago Stock Yards. The boys slept on cots in regulation army tents, each tent being provided with a wooden floor. Each boy was furnished with two woolen blankets and a rubber poncho for protection in case of rain. The camp was in charge of an experienced director and a corps of assistants. Wherever possible the boys were utilized in assisting in the maintenance of cleanliness and order in the camp. The following dail program was strictly adhered to:

1. Reveille (rising hour)	6:00 a. m
2. Setting-up exercises	6:15 a. m
3. Flag raising	6:30 a. m
4. Orders for the day	6:30 a. m
5. Morning dip or washing up	6:45 a. m
6. Breakfast	7:00 a. m
7. Cleaning up tents and grounds	7:30-8:30 a. m
8. Recreations, games or hikes	8:30-11:00 a. m
9. Swimming	11:00-12:00 m
10. Lunch	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]
15. Free period	5:00-6:00 p. m.
16. Supper	6:00 p. m.
17. Entertainment (camp fires, songs and stories)	7:00-9:00 p. m.
18. Taps	9:00 p. m.

Thanks are due to Doctors Harry Kraus and Sebastian Stol, who kindly volunteered their services in conducting the medical examinations for the boys, and to Maurice Markowitz, chairman of the Summer Camp Committee, who gave his time unstintedly to make the camp a success. Through the courtesy of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad free transportation was secured for both the boys and the directors. To the Central B'nai B'rith Council, which contributed $1,000, to Ramah Lodge and Oriental-Hillel Lodge, which each contributed $500, and to the District Grand Lodge, which, at its last convention, appropriated $1,000 for this camp, much satisfaction must come in the knowledge that to 375 boys life was made happier and healthier and more desirable.

There is no doubt but that the Central B'nai B'rith Council will maintain this camp as a permanent B'nai B'rith institution. There is, of course, room for much improvement in the matter of equipment. Many changes have already been suggested. With a continuance of the support and the enthusiasm which launched this venture, the B'nai B'rith Summer Camp will in time become the most attractive Boys' Summer Camp in the country.

KISHINEFF APOLOGIZES TO JEWRY!

The city which became notorious for the first "modern" massacre of Jews under the old regime has tendered its apology to our brethren under the new flag of liberty. The president of the executive of the province, M. Szinsky, in greeting a Jewish demonstration led by the well-known Zionist and communal worker, Dr. Kohan-Bernstein, asked the Jews to forget and forgive all past insults, sufferings and libels. The Russian people, he declared, were not responsible for the cruelty of the old regime towards Jews, and it was now the duty of all citizens to march together under the new flag of brotherhood, equality and freedom. Loud Jewish cheers greeted his appeal.

Progress of Food Conservation Propaganda

The Food Conservation Department at Washington was the scene recently of a number of conferences of large fraternal orders, such as the Elks and the Junior Order United American Mechanics; of denominational bodies, like the Methodists; and of commercial organizations, like the Associations of Traveling Salesmen.

National organizations are constantly sending committees to Washington, who are empowered to pledge to the administration the support of their respective bodies. Returning, they enter on active propaganda, they hold meetings, distribute pledge cards to be filled out, and to show how Mr. Hoover's recommendations as to food conservation have been carried out, and they arrange for lecturers on food preserving, food values, food substitutes, etc. Rabbis and laymen from as far off as Texas and Minnesota volunteered to forfeit part of their vacation for the course of instruction, willing to travel the long distance, in order to become food conservation propagandists and assist our country to the fullest extent in their power.

The propaganda among the Jewish people is carried on at the Bureau of Food Conservation, 1000 Vermont avenue, Washington, and is under the direction of the Rev. Joseph Krauskopf, of Philadelphia. This bureau was instituted by delegates from all the large religious and fraternal organizations, at a conference held at Washington about the middle of July, at the call of Mr. Hoover. Many of the most representative of these bodies have already appointed special committees to conduct inspirational appeals among their respective members. These special committees appoint local committees in each branch of their organizations, and the president of each unit, or local branch, has been written to from Washington, so that the work is being conducted in intensive fashion. The B'nai B'rith, the Central Conference of American Rabbis, the American Union of Roumanian Jews, the Independent Order Free Sons of Israel, and the Independent Order B'rith Sholom have been among the first to start such intensive work, in accordance with Mr. Hoover's program of helping our country toward winning the war, since it is conceded that victory must come to the side that has the greatest reserve of food.

The large summer hotels all over the country have cordially offered their auditoriums for lectures and have promised to distribute literature, while women at the resorts are enthusiastically helping by organizing the women of their neighborhood into classes and demonstration groups.

The Government of the United States, through the Commercial Economy Board of the Council of National Defense, has recently asked the bakers of the country to discontinue the practice of exchanging unsold bread for freshly baked bread. The board is now asking the consumers of the country to assist the baker in his efforts to do away with this wasteful practice.

A country-wide investigation conducted by the Commercial Economy Board convinced it that fully 5 per cent of the bread baked by wholesale bakers was returned to them by bread retailers. Part of this bread was sold to the poor and to charitable institutions, but nearly half of it was disposed of for chicken and hog feed. The result has been that some 500,000 barrels of good wheat and rye flour, made up for human consumption at great cost of manufacture and distribution, has been fed to animals or thrown away. Ultimately, the public has paid for this waste in the higher price necessarily charged by the baker to cover this loss.

Bread one day old is good food—it is, in fact, better and more digestible than fresh bread. When the Jewish public considers that all of Europe is eating war bread—bread in which potatoes, oats, barley and even fiber is substituted for wheat, and that no fresh bread whatever may be sold in England, it will be ready to do its share by accepting day-old bread when necessary. Even this will not be necessary if the consumer will assist the retailer by ordering her bread in advance.

The bakers of many cities have loyally agreed to abide by the wish of the Council of National Defense, made doubly urgent on account of the war and the paucity of flour. The public has proved itself ready to cooperate with the large department stores in limiting the return-goods nuisance, a costly and unnecessary waste of human labor. There is much or more need for the wholehearted cooperation of the public in this movement to abolish the return-bread nuisance, which has meant so unpardonable a destruction of the bread of human life.

The Jewish public, which buys its bread to so large an extent from small retailers and delicatessen stores, will prove their patriotism and their Jewish traditional sense of the wrong of food wasting, by making it possible for these retailers to cooperate with the bakers in abolishing the costly and unnecessary return of unsold bread.

One of the unexpected results of the movement for food conservation necessitated by the diminishing supply of food in the world has been the action of the Jewish bakers in resolving to discontinue Saturday baking. This action is at once a patriotic one and that is of peculiar appropriateness for Jewish bakers to take. It is a tribute to their willingness to forego personal profit for the sake of the country. It is a splendid sign of their readiness to make personal sacrifice when the country calls.

In order that this action shall be sustained and shall have the widest influence, the cooperation of the public is necessary. The public must show that they approve of the patriotic action of the bakers by accepting the new situation gladly and without complaint. The public must show that they appreciate both the gravity of the situation created by the world-wide food shortage, and the motives of action of the Jewish bakers. Particularly the Jewish public should, and undoubtedly will, support the bakers in this move, because of the Jewish value of rescuing the Saturday Sabbath for a group of hard worked purveyors to the public need. The old Jewish law of "six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work, but the seventh day is the Sabbath," is a law the fundamental wisdom of which has been vindicated every day more and more in these times of fierce economic stress and competition. The universal movement for shorter hours of labor and a legally fixed working day, which has been gaining in strength for the last century, is in spirit nothing more than the working of the old Jewish law of the Sabbath. Assuredly the Jewish baker is entitled to his Sabbath rest, and the public will readily and gladly accept the new regime of no baking on Saturday, admirable as this is both from the Jewish and from the patriotic American point of view.

Of a Truth, We Have Sinned

By Dr. Max L. Margolis

Written for the B'nai B'rith News

Sin belongs to the vocabulary of religion. The state takes notice of crimes and human society of offenses. In the abstract ethical systems there is a place for wrongs. Where sin is spoken of, it implies a personal Deity whose law the sinner transgresses. Sin wittingly committed is tantamount to rebellion against God. Some there are who think that sin is preeminently a Christian term. We need only think of the doctrine of original sin and its corollary, redemption. Atonement means the expiation of sin, and vicarious atonement, through a substitute, is once more regarded as Christian domain. Christians see in allusions to sin and atonement and redemption, wherever the terms occur in Judaism, an anticipation of Christianity. Jews are apt to concede that all these things play a subordinate part in Judaism. I understand that our new Bible translation has been found fault with because, in the manner of Christianity, it speaks of "salvation" where it should say "victory" and of "redemption" where perhaps "vindication" or some such-like word would do. As a matter of fact, the critic will find that "victory" has been used frequently. A glance at a well-known passage in the prophet Zechariah will even discover the adjectives "triumphant", "victorious". But all that is beside the mark. When the more religious, so-called Christian terms have been used, there was good ground for their employment. I remember Schechter remarking that the doctrine of "original sin" was Jewish. The difference, as he so well pointed out in print, lies in the fact that in Judaism doctrines did not assume that unbending form with which they were invested in the Christian system. What made for a lesser rigidity in Judaism was the fact that the bearer of Judaism was not an ecclesiastical organization, a church, but the Jewish people, a church-people. I am moved to laughter when a crusader in a recently converted weekly given to abuse of nationalism and Zionism and the Congress movement betrays his woeful ignorance of the religion he preaches by pronouncing a ban on the word "ummah". As a matter of fact, it is the least nationalistic term by which Israel is known. I wonder whether he has ever heard of the Saadyanic phrase, "the ummah which is sanctified by commandments".

No, Judaism knows of sin and of atonement and of redemption, aye, even of the confession of sin. We may be Unitarians in doctrine, but we are like the Catholics in our ritual. Whatever we may be the whole year round, on the "fearful days" we are very much like them. Think of the genuflections, think of the Confessions, think of Atonement which has given the great day of the year its name. Modern society is not built upon lines religious. Take for an example the relation between the sexes. Society condones adulterous relations when open scandal is avoided or when the guilty persons leave the divorce courts for the marriage ceremony. Intellectuals do not speak of these things as sin. Sin is a species of idolatry. In the room of God is placed the strange god in our bosom, passion and greed and lust. The criminal may be acquitted for lack of legal evidence, but in the presence of God the sin remains to be atoned for. In the sanctuary of the religious conscience there cannot come acquittal unless sin is confessed in contrition of spirit. What evolution terms heredity, religion calls original sin. Read the fifty-first psalm. "In sin was I conceived". The moralist is an intellectualist. He believes that to know the good is to practice it. Think of Socrates, the father of ethics as a science. Religion claims that morals are not a "science". Religion alone which has had the human conscience in training for generations untold and which envisages human nature as tainted by its bestial origins, religion alone goes deep beneath the surface and teaches that no man can do his full duty, that when all is said and done there remains for man but to grovel in the dust, prostrate himself before God, and acknowledge his utter failure in the domain of right living. Life is full of compromises, but religion brooks no compromise. The prophets conceive God as the supreme ideal of virtue, unapproachable in holiness. We may seek to imitate God, but we cannot become God. Christianity deifies a man. Judaism never forgets the distance between man and God. Outward piety is not religion. "God testeth the heart". Purity must be in our very thoughts. And correspondingly all outward atonement is futile. The washings and the cleansings and the immersions will not purge away [illegible]. Religion, of course, is apt to be coarsened. Instead of the return to God, penances and fastings; instead of humble petition, noisy recitation of volumes of prayers; instead of righteousness, ostentatious gifts to charity. Judaism in its heights and depths requires the sacrifice of the contrite spirit. Nothing else will avail. Only those who possess not religion speak of religiosity which is its counterfeit. It is not enough to go to the house of God. Sacrifices, says the Preacher, are the gift of the fools, who know not even how to sin. Ask the men and women of the world (and of the underworld) and they will tell you that sin is neither cheap nor obvious. There is a raffinement in sin, refined sinning. Ask the director of corporations and his abettor, the corporation lawyer, and they will tell you that it takes all their ingenuity to keep out of the toils of the law, of men-made law; naturally they escape not the condemnation of religion, though in the house of worship they occupy the front seats.

Yes, there is much in modern society that is rotten through and through. Sin is looked upon by Judaism as a disease of the soul. No quack remedies will do. There is no patent medicine for the sinful soul, for the egoist, the greedy speculator in life's commodities, the trafficker in the honor of his fellow-man, the powerful master who crushes his subordinates into obedience, the corrupter who proclaims that there is no man who has not his price, who cannot be bought, the self-seeking politician who fattens on public revenue, the lobbyist who makes legislation to serve his selfish ends. Many a citizen slinks out of civic duty; a craven youth will seek exemption on ignoble pretenses, perchance because he belongs to the ethicals who of course are the guardians of pacifism; and the state on the other hand terrorizes over the individual. Aye, we have it on the authority of the latest philosophers, that the state can do no wrong. Here is a new fetish, a new god. No, individual and state are both subjects to God's law. The man who robs his neighbor of a plot of land and the state that trespasses upon neighboring territory, both are thieves in the eyes of God. We are witnessing a recrudescence of barbarism in our social life within, and in our political relations with mighty powers abroad. The laws of nations are trampled under foot. Our much-vaunted honesty is often the result of a lack of opportunity. Who can say that he is proof against temptation? Yes, let us confess, all of us without exception, the great and the small, the powerful and impotent, the rulers and the ruled, let us hide our faces in confusion and avow, Of a truth, we have sinned. And confession means, in the language of Judaism, justification of God's judgments, and justification of God means true service of God, the only real profession of the faith that God is One, and that there is none else.

REPRESSION OF ANY CLASS

The Russian revolution marks the end of the martyrdom of a race. . . . The incident of the great change that will bulk biggest in the books is that early in 1917 the last nation to proscribe a people because of creed fell in step with the march of civilization and humanity and religious persecution faded from the earth. There will be no more pogroms, no more Kichenev massacres, no more Pale and no more ghettos in Russia. The centuries-long nightmare of the Jews is over. . . . The revolution means much to the Russian Jews, but it means more to Russia than to the people it sets free. The brains and genius that have been penned in the ghettos—locked out of the professions, banned from the farms—will be loosed to contribute to the progress of the nation. The splendid empire of Siberia, another Mississippi Valley in potential agricultural richness, will not long remain the range of half-savage nomadic tribes when the eager, land-hungry prisoners of the Pale realize that their bars are down. . . . What the Jew has done for England, Germany, France and the United States he will do for Russia. It will take time. You cannot expect a people to come from the night of oppression into the day of opportunity without being bewildered for a space. But the enterprise of the Russian Jew will assert itself more and more. Generation after generation his clannishness will melt before the warmth of tolerance, and he will repay free Russia a thousand-fold for taking off his chains.—Chicago Herald.

Sig. Livingston Bids Godspeed to Boys Called into U.S. Service

When American Boys Join the Colors Amid Martial Strains of Music the World Knows They Go Not for Conquest Nor for Enmity or Glory, but to Protect the Eternal Principles of the Right of Man

Mr. Sigmund Livingston of Bloomington, chairman of the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, who was delegated to give the parting word to the McLean county soldiers at the celebration held on Sept. 4, 1917, in their honor, spoke as follows:

"My Fellow Citizens and Friends:

"To be the spokesman for the people of this county on this occasion is no small task. I had hoped one better fitted and more able would be chosen. It is, indeed, with hesitancy that I assume this duty.

"This is a great day in the annals of this county. It is the first of its kind in this generation. Assembled here are the people of this county to do honor and show their respect for their fellow citizens who have, or are about to join the greatest citizen army of the world.

"This day fills the heart with many contending passions, each battling for mastery.

"There is the parting from mother, as she embraces her boy, and buries her tear stained face in his manly bosom. There is the farewell hand clasp of father as he stoically looks into the face of his soldier son. There is the lingering glance of the loved one as she caressingly gives the token of her undying affection.

"These are the most human sentiments in the human heart. No power on earth can quench them and no man would deprive a single soul of their comfort and their solace.

"These tender sentiments of affection and love will be enshrined in your hearts, and will be to you in after years the green places of memory where you will revel when tired of the toils of the day.

"Then there is the passion of loyalty and patriotism:

"'Breathes there the man with soul
so dead
Who never to himself hath said
This is my own, my native land"'.

"The loyalty of our citizenry is the most wonderful thing in the world. Here we are the children of all the nations of the world. A nation of immigrants. The sons of the once oppressed of all the earth. Our fathers or forefathers left their erstwhile home and braved the unfathomed seas. They broke the shackles of oppression. They could endure tyranny no longer. They sought a land of freedom and equality. They wanted a home where they and their children could worship according to the dictates of their conscience. They established this nation, and gave to the world the doctrine of the inalienable rights of man. They hoisted our flag so that its stars might throw their light into the darkest nights of intolerance and oppression.

"And now, as if decreed by fate, their sons will carry that flag to the lands from which they came to help establish even there these eternal doctrines of liberty and human rights.

"Whatever may have been the initial cause of this world's conflict, is now only an academic proposition. War has its evolution like all other things. The contest now is whether autocracy or the people shall rule. The conflict now is whether the mighty can make prey of the weak. The purpose is to give to each people a chance to live its own destiny. To establish for all times the rule that the rights of one nation ends where the rights of the other begin.

"We are not warring for conquest, and we are thankful for that. We are not warring for self aggrandizement, and we are thankful for that. We are not warring for revenge, and we are thankful for that. We are not warring against any people, and we are thankful for that. Our conflict is with autocratic power, with that despotism that once ruled the entire world. The issue is clear—democracy or autocracy.

"The basic principles of these contending forces are directly opposite. Autocracy is the child of the dark ages. It is the handiwork of tyrants. It believes in the Fatherhood of God, but denies the Brotherhood of man.

"Autocracy believes in the advent of super-man—democracy is founded on the equality of man.

"Autocracy asks man, from whence do you come—democracy is concerned in where he is going.

"Autocracy asks what have you been—democracy says, what are you?

"Autocracy looks to the past—democracy has its eyes set to the future.

"Already out of this dark conflict may be seen the morning star of freedom.

"In Russia and Siberia millions of men and women who were shackled by the rust-crusted chains of intolerance are now breathing for the first time the air of freedom.

"In Germany the spokesmen of the people are even now demanding the right to govern and to rule. The beacons of liberty have been lighted on the hilltops of every land. Human progress cannot be stayed. The people of the world will triumph in victory so that every nation, great or small and every people, mighty or weak, shall have the chance to live and to work out its allotted destiny.

"You who are now to join in the great American army, will dedicate your own selves in the most heroic and self-sacrificing duty of citizenship. The traditions of our army are sacred. It recalls the valor of Bunker Hill, Gettysburg and San Juan. It never was an army of conquest. It has only fought the foe of human rights. When you go to join the colors of your country amidst the martial strains of music, the world knows you go not for conquest, not to vanquish another people, not for enmity or glory, not to bring home the trophies taken from a fallen foe, but for a higher mission, for a nobler cause, you go to protect the eternal principles of the right of man. You go to make safe the democracies of the world. You go to free humanity from the terrors of autocracy. You go to place the star of opportunity over the cradle of every new-born babe. You go to establish eternal peace in the family of human-kind.

"It is only under these conditions that you go. The covenant of this country has been solemnly given—that these are the purposes of our army.

"With these high resolves, burning in living letters of truth upon the banner of the citizen army of America, makes our army insurmountable and unconquerable.

"These are the only purposes which can justify war in this age of the world. Civilization of man has progressed so far that the public opinion of the world makes a war of conquest a crime.

"There cannot now be a victory of arms for any cause which cannot procure a verdict of approval from humankind.

"No nation can successfully wage war for any cause which is not in consonance with the conscience of the civilized world.

"The autocracy of the central powers, through a wonderful organization of an army of good and brave men, who blindly follow the dictates of masters, kept into servile submission by an organization ramified to the minutest detail and overfed with blind devotion and loyalty, have entered the lands and homes of neighboring nations. They intend to stay there and further extend their territory and authority. Belgium is accused of no other act save she resisted the invasion and fought for her national right. Yet the invader demands part of this land. The conscience of the world cannot approve of such conquest. The law of nations has been grossly violated on land and sea. The plea that necessity demands is taken from the faded pages of the history of the past. That necessity makes right is the law of the jungles. It has no existence among civilized nations in this age. How can there be stability and peace among nations when right is tested only by the measure of necessity? There is only one tribunal for contending nations, and that is the conscience of the civilized world. This high court with patience and endurance has watched and waited, and when it could endure no longer, it pointed its finger of accusation at autocracy. No charge is made in this conflict against the Germanic folk. It shares the virtue and vices common to all people. It is peace-loving. It has contributed largely to the science and the art of the world. Its dreamers and poets have enriched the world with beauty, but all this came from the bosom of the common people. Autocracy has never added to the beauty or the happiness of the world. It has been enmeshed in the science of war and with exploiting its people. When peace is again restored, its blessing will be shared by this people. The toiler in the vineyards of the Rhine—the humble herdsman of the verdant fields of Holstein—the peasant of the Black Forest—the craftsmen in the cities, all will share the fruits of democracy.

"The president of this nation enunciated the American doctrine in congress, which when firmly established will bring happiness and peace to ages yet unborn:

'No nation should seek to extend its policy over any other nation or people, but that every people should be left free to determine its own polity, its own way of development, unhindered, unthreatened, unafraid, the little along with the great and powerful.'

"We thank God that there is no other ambition in this land than to have all nations and all people enjoy the blessings of being governed by no other power than the power of the people. There is no nobility of caste here, there is no birthright of special privilege here, there is no place or station in this entire nation which the child born in the humblest home in this land cannot by law and right aspire to and there should not be and will not be in all this world.

"We glory in the fact that our army is composed of free and equal citizens. In this land the soldier, whether private or commander, receives the same respect and admiration. Above the titles given to various ranks in the army, there is one which is held in the highest esteem by the people, one above all others, that of American citizenship.

"You, fellow citizens, who are now, and those who are about to join the army, will be known to history as the disciples of liberty.

"Your friends, your neighbors, and your fellow citizens, have assembled here to do you honor and by these tokens show to you their high esteem.

"If necessity demands, and you go to foreign shores, may the flag of our nation hoisted in all the lands from which our fathers and pioneers came, through its luster and through your valor, bring its blessing to all the world. May the spirit which it typifies—the soul of Americanism, enter the hearts of all mankind so that at last the hope and the dream of man may be realized, and liberty and peace enter every nation and abide in every home.

"We here assembled renew our vow of Americanism:

"We pledge allegiance to our flag,
And to the republic for which it stands:
One nation, indivisible,
With liberty and justice for all'.

"We now bid you God speed, with a fervent hope of your early return with your banner festooned and wreathed with the grandest trophy—an eternal peace for all the world.

"Take with you the best we have—our hearts, our thoughts and our prayers".

MEETING OF THE GENERAL COMMITTEE OF DISTRICT GRAND LODGE NO. 5.

The General Committee of D. G. L. No. 5 met at Richmond, Va., in the rooms of the Jefferson Club on Sunday, Aug. 19th. All the officers and members of the committee were present. The secretary first submitted a detailed report of the numerical and financial standing of each Lodge in the district. The conditions of Obediah Lodge of Augusta and Charlotte of Charlotte, N. C., was noted and the case of both of these Lodges was left in the hands of the president for final action. Mr. C. N. Feidelsohn was requested and agreed to visit Charlotte, Waynesboro and Ashville. Mr. H. S. Bloomberg undertook to settle the dispute over members reported by Maon of Norfolk, Va. Rabbi George Solomon agreed to visit Brunswick and Augusta in an effort to revive Migdol and Obediah. The secretary requested authority to pay $100.00 voted at the last convention for Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital and this was given.

It was stated to the committee that an effort was under consideration to establish a Lodge in Havana, Cuba, and after discussing the matter the committee instructed the secretary to advise the executive committee of the Order and agreed to send its representative in the person to Dr. E. N. Calisch to Havana to co-operate with the representative of the executive committee, provided that the Lodge when formed should be attached to District No. 5. At one-thirty the meeting adjourned for lunch. At two-thirty the session was continued opening with a general discussion of the situation and the outlook of the district. Several Lodges have requested remission of dues for those members enlisted in the Army and Navy and the general committee instructed the secretary to write the executive committee requesting the remission of the dues for such members payable to it, with the understanding that if this were granted the District Grand Lodge should make a similar allowance. The question of welfare work consumed a large portion of the time and thought of the committee. The secretary pointed out that there would be training in concentration camps in 14 places within the district and that probably the very largest percentage of the soldiers and sailors would be stationed within District No. 5. In Virginia there were Fort Meyer, near Washington, Fort Monroe and Hampton Roads near Norfolk, and Newport News, Petersberg and Richmond. In North Carolina., Charlotte. In South Carolina, Port Royal, Greenville, Spartenburg and Columbia. In Georgia, Atlanta, Macon, Augusta besides Fort Screven near Savannah. In Maryland, Anapolis Junction near Baltimore.

The president read the circulars from the board for welfare work of the executive committee and the committee pledged whole-hearted support. The secretary agreed to go to Baltimore to investigate the situation there and after the meeting he visited both Baltimore and Washington, where he found that the B'nai B'rith Lodges were making preparations for this work and he assured them that they could rely on the District Grand Lodge as well as the executive committee for any reasonable and possible support. It was also determined that in so far as possible the district should through its chairman on social services try to arrange for the Jewish soldiers and sailors attending divine services during the holidays at the nearest synagogues, or having services arranged for them at the camps. It was resolved that more particularly this year it would be appropriate to celebrate B'nai B'rith day which falls on Oct. 17, making it a patriotic rally. This was referred to the chairman of Intellectual Culture. At four-thirty the meeting adjourned.

CHIEF RABBI OF SWEDEN BELIEVES WAR WILL SOLVE JEWISH PROBLEM.

Rev. Dr. Marcus Ehrenpreis, Chief Rabbi of Sweden, is firmly convinced that the world war will bring in its wake a permanent and satisfactory solution of the Jewish problem. Even as the French Revolution proclaimed the Rights of Man, so this war will proclaim the Rights of the Peoples, is the opinion of this distinguished and learned leader in Israel.

"I firmly believe", said Rabbi Ehrenpreis, "that this world war, in which we Jews have participated in a proportion of three to every Serb, and four to every Belgian, and in which a great part of the Jewish people has suffered far more than even the Belgians or the Serbs—I firmly believe and sincerely trust, that this world war and all the Jewish blood that has been shed—which we hope will not have been shed in vain—will also bring to our question a satisfactory and permanent solution".

Dr. Ehrenpreis could hardly suppress his emotion as he referred to the plight of the Jews in Palestine. "It is shocking and deplorable in the extreme to see the work of tens of years being foolishly, wantonly destroyed, work which had been brought together by the whole of the Jewry the world over, all destroyed in a few hours by the military", said the Chief Rabbi. "There is really not much that we Jews have not suffered in this war, but this blow is the hardest of all that have descended upon us, for it caught us in a very tender and sensitive spot.

"But our only answer must be: 'The Work Must Go On!'" he declared. "Our projects and our plans in Palestine, which at all times have been loyal and without 'arriere pensee' will remain unchanged by these happenings. The coming Peace Conference will have to declare the right of the Jews to an unhindered development and the emancipation of all Jews who at present are not free. We must very strongly emphasize the point that the Russian Emancipation does not, in any way, minimize the meaning of Palestine for us. Thinking men have never asserted that Jewish colonization in Palestine could ever solve the economic question of the millions of Jews in Russia. But Palestine must become the place where the Jewish absolute culture will be fostered and from which a radiance shall spread in all directions. It must constitute the solution of the question of the future being of Jewry.

"Millerand said recently that as the French Revolution proclaimed the droit de l'homme so the present war should proclaim the droit des peuples. Now, we demand the right of that part of the Jewish people who do not want to live in their present domiciles to live their own life on their own historic soil. And it is the whole logic of the war that this right must not be denied us. Further, whatever may be the fortune of war, concerning Palestine, we have the right to proclaim our demand, and this we should proclaim no matter in which our inner sympathies may lie".

PRO-ISRAELE

A Non-Jewish Association For Jewish Rights

An organization "Pro-Israele" has been formed in Milan, Italy by some of the leading non-Jews of the country, having for its purpose, the defense of Jewish rights in the European reconstruction after the war and to aid the Jews in obtaining Palestine on an autonomous basis. The platform of the society is as follows:

"It has been repeatedly asserted that the present war is destined to solve all problems. This is perhaps too optimistic; but on the other hand it would be absurd pessimism—it would be to despair of mankind—to believe that from so great a struggle there should not result a rejuvenated Europe that could have no reason of feeling abashed in the presence of the young social organism, which day after day, grows more vigorous and at the same time more humane, upon the new continents. This old Europe is dragging along with it an ancient historical heritage of suffering and iniquity, oppressed nations, social nuclei degraded and depressed, inveterate hatreds among neighboring peoples between race and race within the same frontiers. The war that the Allies of the Entente have declared for the protection and respect of the existing nations must bring about a wider recognition of the principle of nationality. Happily, the past can serve as it were, as guarantee of the present. Each of the vast conflicts which bled Europe in the last centuries brought with it the recognition of new nationalities, so has the peace of Westphalen marked the formal recognition of free Holland; the French revolution has freed Flanders; the Napoleonic wars have awakened the striving.for unification on the part of the Italian people.

"A problem of the present hour which because of its international character must necessarily be met in the negotiations for a future peace that should regulate all the relations between the European nations, is the Jewish problem.

"This problem is being already agitated throughout the Jewish world. We believe that it should be agitated earnestly and disinterestedly outside of Jewish spheres. Every great movement for a national and social cause has always been helped by the spontaneous and idealistic cooperation of those who were not directly interested in it. It is this tendency that truly elevated the human spirit and makes us trust in a better future for the world. Thus the reconstruction of Belgium and Serbia today thrills with longing not only Belgians and Serbs, but the whole civilized world. Thus the true renaissance (a comprehensive and not a formal one) of Poland has always been the dream of the noblest souls of Europe. So in their time the establishment of the United States and of Greece was helped by the good-will of all the peoples of Europe and made possible by the help of European powers, especially of the one that has undergone the first aggression in this immense war—France. Thus the very reconstruction of Italy, rapid as it was, is itself due to the goodwill of those civilized nations, to whom it now repays the debt. Finally, the campaign for the emancipation of the negroes was again a passionate and disinterested struggle on the part of men of all lands who were moved by a cause which was not theirs, but which touched their human feelings.

"It is this thought that has guided the formation of a Jewish Committee to further a movement for the Jewish cause in non-Jewish spheres and to present the question not as a Jewish question, but as a human question before the peace congress.

"The position of a non-Jewish Committee that has arisen in the midst of one of the Entente powers is especially delicate, if not arduous.

"On the one hand, inequality of Jews must be deplored in Austria and in Germany; there must be deplored likewise their civil and political inequality and grave iniquities perpetrated upon them in the very group of the Entente Allies (this was written before the Russian revolution—Translator): sins are committed both within and without. On the other hand, the Jewish world itself is divided in its aspirations, and pursues two ideals, as it were, in contrast to one another: the ideal of civic and social equality of the Jews in the States of which they form a part; and that of the re-establishment of the Jewish nation upon a territory of its own, more particularly the resurrection of the ancient kingdom of Jerusalem in which should be gathered the scattered members of the Jewish family.

"This state of affairs and this mental disposition need not stop us. The powers of the Entente that have raised the emblem of the nationalist principle must likewise feel the duty of appearing at the peace congress with pure and elevated propositions also with regard to this question, which is in itself quite nationalistic, and certainly a moral and social question of first rank.

"On the other hand precisely, because it is outside of the Jewish world, our Committee can occupy in the presence of that world's aspirations an impartial position and fix the principles of its program in a way as not to put itself down exclusively to any procedure. What is our program?

"History of all times has established in a most enlightening fashion that the Jews are trustworthy and useful members of all communities of which they form part. They have complained when the violence of the rulers and the masses, inflamed by ignorance and superstition, drove them now from one fatherland, now from another; but they have never been traitors. The famous accusation too often launched against them in one of the nations of the Entente, has only served to show their inability to betray and at the same time the lasting injustice of the suspicion.

"Justice and the interest of the States in such justice and self-interest which in the highest questions reveal their indissoluble union should bring about the recognition throughout all Europe of the principle of civic emancipation and political and social equality of the Jews. This is the first part of our program and also its principal part since it comprises the recognition of many special aspirations. Once their full civic equality is in fact recognized, it is needless to demand provision for the respect of the Jewish cult; for the use of the Jewish language; for the preservation of their own culture and usages; the freedom of association and the like. Once their liberty is acknowledged it remains the task of the Jews as a group to preserve intact the treasure of their institutions and to maintain their distinctness in their security. It is not the task of the State; it would even be tyranny on its part to desire that this preservation be forcibly maintained, especially at a time when events and the will of the Jewish people bring about the most intimate fusion with their neighbors.

"The second part of our program concerns the Zionist ideal. It is manifest now that with regard to this ideal we cannot assume a positive and active line of contact. If the Jewish world is itself divided, we cannot pretend to introduce there unity and agreement in the aspirations imposing upon that world our mentality and our point of view. Nor can we take the liberty of discussing the weak points in the realization of that ideal and inaugurate or provide for its disappearance, when that other ideal, less brilliant but more practical—that of liberty and equality of the scattered Jewish nuclei—would have achieved its full realization.

"But if we cannot in any way and for diverse reasons work positively on behalf of the Zionist ideal we can aim on our side that there be eliminated the obstacles of a political and civic nature, that stand in the way of its realization, if only within modest bounds.

"By dint of favorable circumstances it can be provided that the established political destiny of Palestine be laid down in the peace treaty. Now, whatever be that destiny, we must demand that the Jews who desire to transfer their residence to Palestine be conceded, on the strength of that residence alone, rights of citizenship and immediate equalization with the native population especially as regards the right to own property.

"With this obstacle eliminated and when by means of a single formality even the establishment and acquisition of estates in Palestine will be made possible it remains with the Jews and Jewish organizations to undertake the transmigration into Palestine of that part of the people in which that idealistic aspiration is stronger than the tie to their new fatherland.

"Freedom and equality of the Jews among the various nations of Europe, freedom and creation of favorable conditions for the resuscitation of the Jewish State without artificial forcing of the Jewish people upon the course. This is our double program. For the carrying out of that program we shall prepare studies and treaties and we shall undertake the work of persuasion and propaganda by means of lectures, writings, pamphlets, but above all by preaching among social spheres and collective presentations before the public, national and international instances especially before the powers of the Entente and at the right time before the representatives of the civilized world at the future Peace Congress.

"Finally a more time taking, a profounder task the Association will have to enlighten, so that hostile feeling towards Israel, the sad survival of superannuated prejudices, the feeling artificially maintained in certain social spheres and especially alive among the enemy powers, Austria and Germany—disappear from the minds of the civilized people and that there be recognized the true equalization, moral and social, of all those who feel themselves sons of Israel in every corner of the world".

JEWS LOYAL TO DEMOCRACY

Meredith Nicholson Pays Tribute to Inspiring Example Set by Sons of Israel in America's Crisis.

To the Editor of "The Star":

There appears in "The Star" of this morning a dispatch from Boston under the caption, "Fifteen Thousand Jews Pledge Lives". It recited that in Boston a great gathering of New Englanders of the Jewish faith pledged themselves, their lives and their fortunes to the support of the American government during the war. The convention that passed these resolutions was a joint meeting of the Hebrew Association of New England, the Associated Young Women's Hebrew Associations of New England, and the Hebrew Teachers of Massachusetts.

This action on the part of these representative Jewish organizations is only another evidence of the fine patriotic spirit and devotion to America and American ideals manifested by our Jewish fellow citizens from the hour of our entrance into the war. At the same time that Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, the greatest of American orators, was renouncing in a public address at Lake Placid his former extreme pacifist views and declaring, as he had already done in the great meeting for the relief of Jewish sufferers in the war, held at the Murat Theatre earlier in the summer, the solemn duty of the American government to throw its power against the enemies of liberty and democracy, the mail brought me a post card from Joel E. Spingarn, one of the finest of literary scholars, formerly professor of comparative literature in Columbia University. A few years ago Dr. Spingarn visited Indianapolis and delivered an address on race prejudice in one of the negro churches. A fine thing, this, that a man of highest cultivation, possessed, I may add, of great wealth, should devote his time not merely to combating the ancient prejudice against his own people, but should courageously broaden his protest and plea to include another and less favored race. Dr. Spingarn, in his post card acknowledgment of a note I had written him some time ago, explained his silence by signing himself "Major, Infantry, O. R. C."

If in the literature of the world there is anything nobly and indelibly written it is the cry of Israel in all ages for liberty, justice and mercy. That this heroic race should support this world war against autocracy is not surprising; that Jewish merchants and bankers should aid the American cause was to be expected; but their fine patriotism should not pass unrecognized, little as they seek praise, impatient as they may be of words of admiration. It is their due to say that among all the peoples assembled under the Stars and Strips none is more deeply or intelligently loyal to the great cause of democracy than the Jews of America.

Verily, hatred of oppression, mercilessness, and the love of righteousness is in the blood of Israel. The Jew's march—yea, in his flight across the world, has been a quest for the freedom he found in America, and nobly has he responded to every call to support the ideals of the mighty prophets of his race that America has realized. In this day, when far too many Americans imperfectly grasp the deep significance of this war, too great stress cannot be laid upon the fact that it is a war to "bring down the mighty from their seat" and to exalt the people above their rulers.

"Shall the ax boast itself against him that heweth therewith"? cried Isaiah. "Or shall the saw magnify itself against him that shaketh it? as if the rod should shake itself against them that lift it up, or as if the staff should lift up itself, as if it were no wood".

HUNGARIAN STATESMAN ON THE FUTURE OF THE POLISH JEWS.

The Hungarian Statesman and ex-premier, Baron Khuen Hedervary, has expressed his firm belief that the Jews will obtain equal rights in the new Polish State. While aware of the present anti-semitic wave in Polish circles, he took note of the frequent reports of expressions of hatred towards Jews among the Poles, but he felt convinced that in time more amicable relations would exist between Jews and Poles. Such a chance, however, could not occur in a short period.

A JEWISH MUSEUM IN BERLIN

The war, notwithstanding, a museum has been opened in Berlin under the auspices of the Jewish community. Its establishment was made possible through a trust by the late Albert Wolf of Dresden, a well-known collecter of Jewish antiques. The collection comprises Jewish antiques, coins, medals, pictures, and manuscripts. The museum was inaugurated a fortnight ago and is open free twice weekly.

ITALY AND JEWISH FREEDOM.

The Vessillo Israelitico recently addressed to about two hundred senators and deputies a letter, asking whether they considered that Italy should demand at the Peace Conference the concession of equal rights to Jews of all lands where today it is denied to them. Practically all expressed themselves strongly in favor of the concession of equal rights to Jews, and warmly welcomed the idea that Italy should take the initiative in this matter. One or two expressed a doubt as to whether the Peace Conference was the proper occasion for the purpose.

Sketches of Modern Jewish History

By Gotthard Deu[illegible]

I. The Historian Graetz, a Centenary.

The interest in history presupposes pride in the past. From the time of Herodotus, proud of the remarkable victory of the Greeks over the Persians, down to the days of Freiherr von Stein, who planned the marvelous edition of the sources of German history, "Monumenta Germaniae", after the defeat of Napoleon, this fact is always and everywhere manifest. The Book of Daniel, a wonderful piece of universal history, in spite of its apocalyptic form, shows the effect of the buoyancy of the Jews, having won their independence against the overwhelming power of Syria. The work of Josephus is no exception, although apparently written by a defeated general. This defeat, however, after a struggle that lasted for three years, against the world power of the Roman Empire, was, morally considered, no more a defeat than that of the Boers when they lost their fight against the British Empire.

This consideration explains to us the strong and rapidly growing interest in Jewish history, following their emancipation in revolutionary France. A fight, lasting for nearly fifteen hundred years, had finally been won. The Jews disenfranchised by the Roman Emperors when the empire became Christian, were at last liberated. Their leading scholars began to turn proudly to the history of the past. It would be impossible to give a complete outline of Jewish historiography. A few brief notes must suffice. Leopold Zunz (1794-1886) had shown the way by the collection of material. His schoolmate, Isaac Marcus Jost (1793-1860) had made an attempt to cast the material, as far as it was known, into a readable work. No one author, however, was as successful in holding the attention of the large public, and in furnishing to technical scholars a standard work, to which they always had to refer, no matter how much they differed in detail, as was Graetz, whose work has proven its popularity by the many editions through which it has gone, and by translation into several languages. There must be merit underlying this fact, and this we wish to show in connection with the biography of the Jewish historian par excellence.

Hirsch Graetz was born in the little hamlet of Xions, province of Posen, Oct. 31, 1817. Some authors call him "Heinrich," but it is quite unlikely that Graetz's father, a plain butcher in a little provincial town of Prussian Poland, should a hundred years ago, have indulged in the luxury of calling his son such a euphonious name. On the title page of his first work, published in 1846, Graetz calls himself "Hirsch." In his later works, beginning with Volume IV of his History, which appeared in 1853, he only uses the initial "H," and so he continued during his whole literary career. Only the Latin catalog of the University of Breslau, where he taught as honorary professor, converts this "Hirsch" into a "Henricus." This metamorphosis clearly shows us in an insignificant detail the influence of Graetz's early environment. Prussia had in 1772 taken a slice of the kingdom of Poland. After various rearrangements of the map, this part of Poland became definitely part of the kingdom of Prussia, in 1815, after the downfall of Napoleon. We may say what we want about the autocratic and bureaucratic regime of Prussia, its efficiency we cannot deny. Jewish affairs prove it most conclusively. Russia, which took the lion share of Poland, kept her Jews in a state of subjection, which resulted in their aloofness. Austria, well meaning under Joseph II, who succeeded to the throne eight years after the annexation, was not efficient in carrying out her intention of civilizing the Jews. The unrestricted power of a tyrannical church, governed by the Jesuits, and a selfish landed nobility. accomplished for Galicia largely the same results, which followed Russian tyranny. The glaring difference between the condition of the Jews in the Prussian part of Poland, and that of their former compatriots in the new Russian and Austrian sections, shows this at a glance. The Prussian minister of education, von Altenstein, issued in 1825 a law, which introduced compulsory secular education of the Jews. Joseph II of Austria had tried the same method nearly forty years previously, but the law is still to this day a dead letter. The effects of the Prussian system showed themselves in the many prominent Jewish scholars, natives of the province of Posen, who were Graetz's contemporaries. I mention the philosopher Lazarus, the historian Jaffe, and the medical celebrities Remak and Senator. They are only a few selections from a large galaxy.

Secular education could [illegible] n without influence on Jewish [illegible] e Bahur, who, as Aaron Bern[illegible] r-ously presents him to us [illegible] l, "Voegele der Maggid," read in the Beth Hamidrash Kotzebue's "Verzweiflung," quickly placing his Talmud over it, if he thought himself observed, gives us the typical character of the young men during Graetz's formative period. They wanted to combine good old Jewish traditions with modern secular culture. At that time a highly gifted man made the first attempt to prove that orthodox Judaism was in full harmony with modern culture. Samson Raphael Hirsch (1808-1888) had written his pamphlet, "Neunzehn Briefe ueber Judentum" (Altona 1836). Young Graetz eagerly devoured it. He wrote to the author an enthusiastic letter, asking for the privilege of becoming his disciple. Hirsch answered favorably, and Graetz spent three years at his home in Emden. After serving for two years as tutor with a Jewish family in the province of Posen, he entered the University of Breslau, from which he graduated in 1846, writing as his thesis a book on the relation between early Christianity and Judaism. This book, which was published in 1846 under the title, "Gnosticismus und Judentum," he dedicated to Hirsch, his "teacher and fatherly friend." A year later Hirsch was called as Landrabbiner to Moravia, and Graetz followed him there, obtaining through his influence, a position as principal of the Jewish school of Lundenburg, a small town about ten miles from Nikolsburg. While in this position, Graetz married Marie Monasch, the daughter of a Hebrew publisher in Krotoschin. As principal of an elementary school, Graetz with his academic mind was surely not in place. He left the town, went to Berlin, where he devoted himself to the great work which made his name immortal.

A most remarkable proof of his energy is the fact that he carried the work out in the manner in which it was planned, though it took twenty-two years to complete it. A complete history of the Jewish people from the earliest beginnings to the time of the author, was to appear in eleven volumes. Graetz began with the fourth volume, comprising the history of the Talmudic period. It was published in 1853 and was not a financial success. The publisher refused to proceed with the work. It was fortunte for Graetz that just at that time Ludwig Philippson (1811-1889), the most practical of German rabbis and authors, organized a Jewish publication society. Graetz offered his manuscript to them, and they accepted it. So he was enabled to publish the third volume, comprising the greater part of the Maccabaean period, in 1856. Again, four years later, volume 5 appeared, and afterwards he published the succeeding volumes in regular order, until in 1870 the eleventh volume brought the history down to the year 1848. Having carried the work in this way down to his own days, he went to Palestine to prepare himself for the composition of the first two volumes comprising the Biblical period. They appeared in 1874 and 1876. So this monumental work was finished and Graetz had the satisfaction to prepare some volumes like the third for the fourth edition, and to see translations of part of his work into French, English and Hebrew.

What was the merit of his work, compared with that of his predecessors, especially with that of Jost? I would answer this question with the words of Ludwig Philippson, noteworthy because they come from a man who just at that time was strongly antagonistic to Graetz, but who also as a publicist of rare merit is a classic interpreter of popular sentiment. Philippson says: "Graetz's history is not as strictly scientific as is that of Jost, but it is written by a warm-hearted Jew, and this made it popular. In addition, Graetz made an exhaustive study of the sources, and gives us a greater amount of facts".

In order to understand the work of the great historian, we have to appreciate the difficulty of his labors. Jewish history extends over almost every known civilized country. Its sources are written in numerous languages and—what is most difficult—are interspersed in works of entirely different scope. We will find scattered notes on events, dealing with Jews, in the annals of a mediaeval monk, writing in a German convent, in an Arabic book on the history of medicine, in collections of laws, in inscriptions in old cemeteries, and in addition to all this, the sources are often legendary, or intentionally colored by the author's purpose. It required indeed a master mind to bring order into such chaos.

The Talmudic period to which Graetz devoted his first labor gives us the clearest evidence of the last named difficulty. We are told in a Talmudic legend that Rabbi Eliezer Ben Hyrkanus was excommunicated by his brother-in-law, Gamaliel, the patriarch. The events leading to this excommunication are presented as follows: In the academy of Jabneh a ritualistic question was discussed, which to us is not quite intelligible. It dealt with the problem, whether a so-called Aknai oven was clean or unclean. Eliezer held an opinion different from that of all the other rabbis. In support of his opinion he invoked the aid of heaven. Upon his command a sycamore tree transplanted itself to a different place, the water in an aqueduct ran uphill, and the walls of the auditorium began to incline, threatening collapse. In spite of all these miracles, the rabbis refused to accept Eliezer's ideas. He finally asked for a direct statement from heaven and indeed a voice from heaven was heard saying: "Eliezer is right". Yet the rabbis would not accept his opinion, declaring that the Torah was not in heaven. More than that, instead of recognizing his authority, so manifestly backed by God's intercession, the rabbis excommunicated Eliezer as a heretic. None dared to break him the news because it was feared that he would invoke God's revenge. Therefore his beloved disciple, Akiba, was chosen as messenger, who broke the unwelcome news so gently that Eliezer resigned himself to his fate. Still his wife, Imma Shalom, the sister of Gamaliel, was very much concerned. She knew the power of her husband's prayer, and was afraid that if he poured out his grief before the Lord, the consequences for her brother, who had caused the trouble, would be serious. She, therefore, watched her husband carefully and would not allow him to prostrate himself in prayer. One time, however, she was called out to the door by a poor man, and while she attended to her mission of charity, her husband had prostrated himself in prayer. Returning, and seeing him in this attitude, she knew at once that her brother had died, and surely a little while later a messenger came announcing this fact.

We all know that this story cannot be taken as an actual fact, even aside from the miraculous features. We ask ourselves why it should have been such an offense on the part of Eliezer to hold an opinion on an insignificant law, different from that of his colleagues, when all through the Talmud, beginning with the first paragraph, such differences on important laws are recorded in almost every chapter. We fail to understand why miracles, even if they did not happen and were merely believed, should not have convinced the rabbis of the correctness of Eliezer's view. Graetz passes over these reports rather lightly. He adopts a rationalistic attitude, saying that it was believed that a voice from heaven, which was believed to decide such questions, had been heard, but he fails to make us understand what such a controversy actually must have meant, and indeed it is only a conjecture of more or less probability which can give an interpretation of such queer legends.

In spite of this precaution Graetz soon became the target of attacks from the orthodox side. The main reason was that he as historian explained the rabminical law as the result of conditions of the time, while orthodoxy declared it an unalterable divine law, which was handed down by faithful oral tradition from the time of Moses. The leader in these attacks was his former teacher and patron, S. R. Hirsch. I somewhat suspect that this change of attitude was due to personal reasons, and for this purpose a survey of the leading theological conceptions of Judaism at that period is necessary.

The struggle for obtaining civic and political equality for the Jews, which had first been recognized in France in 1791, began in earnest after the July revolution of 1830 all over Europe. The opponents of the emancipation of the Jews advanced as their strongest argument the religious law which condemned the Jews to aloofness from their neighbors. This was the first impetus to a revision of religious conceptions. It cannot be denied, however, that long before progressive Jews had felt that their religion must be harmonized with the advanced civilization of the age. As in all religious and political movements, there was a radical, a conservative, and a compromising party. The radical party, whose spokesman, David Friedlaender (1750-1834), a wealthy Berlin manufacturer, author and communal worker, was a disciple of Moses Mendelssohn, demanded a complete surrender of everything distinctly Jewish. Their religion was a pure rationalism, which should bring together Jews and Christians on one common platform. The rigid conservatism was represented by men of the type of Rabbi Moses Sofer (1762-1839), who wished to preserve the Judaism of the eighteenth century, with all its ghetto features in education and social life. A step in advance was presented by Samson R. Hirsch, who, retaining the old conception of Judaism in belief and in ritual was willing to accept secular education and the social manners of a western environment as features that could be harmonized with traditional Judaism. A compromising attitude was presented by Zechariah Frankel (1801-1875), who would retain traditional Jewish practices in synagogue and in private life as an emotional requirement, but would allow full freedom in all spiritual matters. He would, for instance, admit that the belief in the national restoration of Israel and in the reintroduction of the sacrificial cult was not to be literally understood, but he would still retain it in the services. He would further demand the respect of the traditional Sabbath observance, and the dietary laws, but would be willing to interpret them as a historic growth, thus giving up the idea that Judaism presents in its rabbinic conception the exact aspect of the Mosaic religion.

The conflict between Frankel and the liberal school came to a climax in 1845 at the Rabbinical Conference, held at Frankfort am Main. This Conference passed a resolution which indirectly declared itself in favor of substituting the vernacular for the Hebrew in public worship. Frankel indignantly protested against this resolution in the public press and left the Conference. We might see in this act the declaration of what afterwards was called "historic Judaism". Amongst those who enthusiastically expressed their approval of Frankel's attitude, was Graetz, then a student at Breslau University. From that time he remained in contact with Frankel, and when the latter, in 1854, assumed the presidency of the rabbinical seminary of Breslau, the first modern training school for rabbis in Germany, he called Graetz there as professor of history. Graetz remained on the staff of this institution until his death, Sept. 7, 1891, and contributed largely to its fame.

It is one of the most obvious experiences in religious history, that parties, which have from the point of view of the outsider more in common than what divides them, are most bitter in their controversies. Hirsch considered the Breslau school, and perhaps rightly so, as more dangerous to his conception of Judaism than the advanced liberals. So his former disciple, Graetz, became the target of his bitterest denunciations. The reason for this change of attitude has already been indirectly stated. Graetz interprets the rabbinical law as the result of conditions of the time. We have, for instance, the statement that a rabbinical council declared that a Jew may transgress the law in order to save his life, except in cases of idolatry, incest and murder. Graetz ingeniously dates this interpretation of the Jewish law from the time of Hadrian, when the Jews were compelled to violate the Sabbath, to give up circumcision, and the study of the Torah. He argued that under such conditions the rabbis had to compromise between theory and practice. Hirsch correctly said that this would be a clear justification of all reform, and therefore insisted that the rabbinical law cannot be entitled to respect, if it is not independent of time and environment.

It is quite remarkable that Graetz, condemned by the orthodox as a radical, was with equal bitterness attacked by the reformers. He had given them cause for provocation by his presentation of the reform movement. All changes in the prayerbook are to him a mimicry of Christianity. Judaism is no "Gebetsreligion". Confirmation he regards as an empty show. Judaism does not express itself in a confession of creed. Aaron Chorin (1766-1844), the first officiating rabbi who advocated reform in worship, is, according to Graetz, a mere babbler, who repeated the same platitudes in Hebrew, German and Yiddish. This antagonism to two opposite extremes requires an explanation of Graetz's view of Judaism. To put it briefly: Graetz sees in Judaism a national expression. He, therefore, considers Judah Halevi the best exponent of Judaism, for he declared that Israel was to be a model people, which had to carry out its destiny in Palestine. It is indeed a pity that Graetz could not live six years longer. Had he lived to see Herzl's

NEWS FROM LONDON

By Our Correspondent Dr. M. Epstein

London, Aug. 14, 1917.

June 17, 1917, will be a red-letter day in Anglo-Jewish history. On that famous Sunday the old Anglo-Jewish communal regime received a shock from which it is hardly likely to recover. The attack was delivered at a meeting of the Jewish Board of Deputies, and the weapon utilized was a resolution in the following terms: "That the board having considered the views of the Conjoint Committee as promulgated in the communication published in the Times of the 24th of May, 1917, expresses profound disapproval of such views and dissatisfaction at the publication thereof, and declares that the Conjoint Committee has lost the confidence of the board and calls upon its representatives on the Conjoint Committee to resign their appoint forthwith." This motion was carried by a majority of five votes, 56 being cast in its favor and 51 against.

A word of comment may be necessary for our readers in America. What is the board? The Board of Deputies of British Jews, to give it its full designation, is a body on which the larger part of the Jewish congregations in the British Empire is represented. In effect only the communities in the British Isles are really represented. But such as it is, the board's business is to look after general Jewish affairs, to safeguard Jewish interests where these appear to be jeopardized and to take public action on all Jewish matters. The board has been called the Anglo-Jewish Parliament, which shows at any rate how high its importance is esteemed. For a number of years the presidency of the board has been held by Mr. David Alexander, a king's counsel, who has grown white in the service of the community. Mr. Alexander is a man of affairs, with a grasp of business, who knows how to take action effectively. But Mr. Alexander has somewhat antiquated notions as to how representative bodies should be ruled. Louis XIV of France is credited with having said on one occasion: "I am the State". Mr. Alexander may be said to hold the view: "I am the Board of Deputies".

"I am the Board of Deputies". And he ruled it accordingly. All things came from above, and the ordinary members were made to feel that it was an honor to be allowed to vote for the proposals of the executive.

For a time the board put up with this treatment. But even a worm will turn. Step by step, as deputies who joined the board were men of democratic aims and ideas, they demanded to have some say in the affairs of the community, and not be asked to say amen! to the cut and dry proposals placed before them. Mr. Alexander was a clever tactician, and Mr. Alexander won. But it was clear that the struggle would come to a head before long, and it was by no means uncertain how it would end. A step undertaken by the Conjoint Committee ignited the powder magazine.

What is the Conjoint Committee? It happened over and over again that when it was necessary to approach a Government department on some Jewish question two sets of representations were made, one by the Board of Deputies, the other by the Anglo-Jewish Association. The latter body is a private society to which Jews belong by subscribing what they can afford, the object of the association being to provide education for poor Jews in eastern countries. A worthier end can hardly be mentioned. Jews and education—that is a natural association. The A. J. A. (as it is called for short) has built schools and provided teachers for Jewish children in Turkey, in Palestine, in Egypt, in Morocco, in India, and the work it has done deserves every meed of praise. At the head of the A. J. A. stands Mr. Claude G. Montefiore, whose conception of his duties to Jewry are exceedingly idealistic and fine. Year in, year out, when the finances of the association showed a deficit, no matter how large the amount, it was wiped off by Mr. Claude Montefiore's generosity. His whole heart is in the work, and the A. J. A. deserves the support of Jews everywhere. The point to bear in mind, however, on the present occasion is that the A. J. A. is a distinctly private society, without the least claim to being representative of the community. The Board of Deputies, on the other hand, is nothing if not representative. When, therefore, it became apparent that both bodies made representations to Government, it was decided for the sake of the peace and dignity of the community, without inquiring too deeply into the rights of the case, to have one organ for doing business with Government offices. That was called the Conjoint Committee of the Board of Deputies and the A. J. A., both of which were represented on it in equal numbers, and the two presidents of the larger societies were, as it were, the two-headed chief of the Conjoint Committee. The Conjoint had certain characteristics which did not make for popularity. It worked in secret, and for a time the public did not even know who were its members. Reports of its doings were indeed furnished to the Board of Deputies and to the A. J. A., but these reports consisted of extracts of the minutes of the proceedings of the Conjoint Committee. Secrecy begets mistrust, and the community began to be restive at the activities of the Conjoint. In the pre-war period there were no large problems of Jewish interest, and the village pump politics which the Conjoint Committee took so seriously, and covered with a veil of mystery, hardly interested the mass of Jews. So the Conjoint was tolerated. It did not much matter.

The war came. The war continued for one year, two years, three years. The end seems hardly in sight yet. Men began thinking of the settlement after the war. President Wilson's historic, magnificent declarations were issued to the world. Cabinet ministers spoke of a better future. The Czechs, the Poles and other small nationalities became active. So did the Zionists. Jews began to take a passionate interest in the political reconstruction of Europe. There was good cause for that interest. Jews were still suffering disabilities in many countries. Then came the Russian revolution, and the entry into the war on the side of democracy of the United States. It was time to think of the future.

Jews were thinking. There was as yet no definite proposal put forward by any party. The people mostly concerned were the Zionists. Men were exchanging views in order to arrive at a clear conception of possibilities, when all of a sudden a bombshell fell from the clouds. On the 24th of May, 1917, there appeared over the signatures of David L. Alexander, president of the Board of Deputies of British Jews, and Claude G. Montefiore, president of the Anglo-Jewish Association, a letter purporting to speak in the name of the Conjoint Committee, and informing the British public that the latter objects (1) to the national character of the Jewish resettlement of Palestine, and (2) to certain special rights to be granted to Jews there "in excess of those enjoyed by the rest of the population".

It is very doubtful whether these two points are really claimed by the Zionists. But let that stand; let it even be admitted that the points are arguable. What is objectionable in the manifesto is that it gives the impression that its authors are speaking in the name of the community. Yet no one was consulted. The Board of Deputies were not told about the manifesto; nay it was led to believe that no manifesto existed. The A. J. A. was not told about it. And, what is worse, when at the next meeting of each of these bodies, the president was censured for his action, in each case he put forward the astounding claim that the Conjoint Committee was an independent body, subject to no one, and able to do what it willed. The Anglo-Jewish Association supported its president. This was to be expected, and is of no consequence. But the Board of Deputies, which does matter, told its president that it would have none of him, and he resigned. The adoption of the resolution given above was hailed in the community as a victory for democracy, as the end of the era of the Anglo-Jewish "Grand Dukes".

In order to complete the story it should be stated that when the manifesto was published, a storm of indignation broke out in the Jewish community. On the following day the Times printed a letter from the chief rabbi, in these terms:

"Sir: I do not propose to advance any arguments contesting the extraordinary statement on Zionism and Palestine which you published on Thursday last, signed by Mr. D. L. Alexander, K. C., and Mr. Claude G. Montefiore. But, as chief rabbi of the United Hebrew Congregations of the British Empire, I cannot allow your readers to remain under the misconception that the said statement represents in the least the views held either by Anglo-Jewry as a whole or by the Jewries of the Overseas Dominions. Moreover, neither the Board of Deputies nor the Anglo-Jewish Association—on whose behalf their presidents signed the document in question—authorized its publication or had an opportunity of considering its contents.

"It is, indeed, grievously painful to me to write this in your influential columns but I am impelled to do so in the interests of truth, and in justice to the communities of which I have the honor and privilege of being the spiritual head".

Equally important was the letter from Lord Rothschild, in which he wrote:

"I consider it most unfortunate that this controversy should be raised at the present time, and the members of the Zionist organization are the last people desirous of raising it. Our opponents, although a mere fraction of the Jewish opinion of the world, seek to interfere in the wishes and aspirations of by far the larger mass of the Jewish people. We Zionists cannot see how the establishment of an autonomous Jewish state under the aegis and protection of one of the Allied Powers can be considered for a moment to be in any way subversive to the position or loyalty of the very large part of the Jewish people who have identified themselves thoroughly with the citizenship of the countries in which they live. Our idea from the beginning has been to establish an autonomous center, both spiritual and ethical, for all those members of the Jewish faith who felt drawn irresistibly to the ancient home of their faith and nationality in Palestine".

This, by the wav, was the first intimation many people had that his lordship was a professed Zionist.

The general press took up the matter; congregations throughout the length and breadth of the land condemned the publication of the manifesto, and the great mass of Anglo-Jewry was disgusted at the high-handed procedure. When Mr. Alexander resigned people felt sorry for the individual but welcomed the overthrow of the autocratic system for which he stood. The next step was to find a new executive for the Board of Deputies. Sir Stuart Samuel was chosen president, Lord Rothschild and Sir Philip Magnus were elected vice-presidents, and Mr. Nathan Laski headed the poll for treasurer. But more was accomplished. At that same meeting of the board, on July 15, 1917, the following resolution was carried by 44 votes to 14: "That steps be taken to terminate at the earliest possible moment the arrangement between the Board of Deputies and the Anglo-Jewish Association constituting the Conjoint Committee".

The work of organizing the struggle was enormous. It was necessary to send out whips to likely deputies, to agree on a plan of action, to be ready for moves and counter-moves which experience had shown to be essential. It may interest brethren in America to learn that the London Lodge was instrumental in forging the victory, and that Brother President Gilbert on this occasion surpassed even his wonted energy. Not only the lodge but the Anglo-Jewish community owes him a great debt of gratitude. To crown his unselfish work, he resigned his own membership of the board in order to allow Sir Stuart Samuel, who was not a member at the time, to succeed him. Moreover, it is gratifying that the new treasurer of the deputies, Mr. Nathan Laski, is a prominent brother of the lodge in Manchester, and may justly be described as the leader of Manchester Jewry. If the London Lodge had done nothing else, its assistance in the work of reforming the Board of Deputies would have justified its establishment to the fullest degree.

Communal affairs generally are now more or less at a standstill, the summer vacation not yet being ended. But death is not bound by man's artificial time divisions, and has deprived the community of two men who, though old in years (both reached the Psalmist's span), will be missed. The one is Leopold de Rothschild; the other is Sir Joseph Lyons. With "Mr. Leopold", as he was lovingly called, the last of the old generation of the English Rothschild has passed away. The story of his friendship with the late King Edward, the presence of the latter when still Prince of Wales at Leopold de Rothschild's wedding, the high standard of philanthropy which was practiced by the family, all read like pages from some old book. Leopold de Rothschild was in the best sense of the term a thorough English gentleman. In the city he was exceedingly popular, and his interest in the affairs of the community is well known. A passage from his will throws a flood of light on the true Jewish spirit dominating his family life. "I have not", he says, "specifically divided my property among my sons because I have the utmost confidence in their good sense and affection for each other, and I am sure that they will arrive at a fair and equable division in the same way as my brothers and I did after our dear father's death".

If Leopold de Rothschild was, as it were, born in the purple, Joseph Lyons climbed and climbed until he attained it. He cannot be said to have be[illegible] nent in communal affairs. Inte[illegible] was, and always ready to give [illegible] hand. But his fame and fortune [illegible] up with the business of London [illegible] Lyons became the champion [illegible] terer, and his name is immortalized over the tea shops that abound in every quarter of the capital. He was a gifted business man, could paint, sketch, invent and above all, tell a good story. Sir Jo any was the type of Jew whose enterprise and ability are an asset to the country in which they live. When the economic reconstruction after the war commences, it will be just those qualities that will be required everywhere.

But the war is not yet over, and in this country the newest war surprise is a Jewish regiment. Russian subjects resident in England must now either return to Russia to serve there, or join the British army to serve here. In order to facilitate their enlistment and training the idea of a Jewish unit was mooted. The War Office itself is responsible for the new creation, for no one was consulted, neither any organization nor any individual. Colonel Patterson, who took charge of the Zion Mule Corps in the Gallipoli campaign, will be in command, and it has been decided that the headdress to be worn by the regiment will be of the Colonial or American pattern, with a blue and white band, and the badge will be the Magen David with the Lion of Judah in the center. It is intended that the field of operations for the Jewish unit shall be Palestine. Arrangements will also be made for special food and for synagogue services; and a committee has been formed to take the matter in hand. Opinion in the community is divided as to the expediency of the special Jewish unit, but as the matter is a fait accompli, it seems hardly worth while discussing it. The intention was that it should make the service of the Russian Jews in the British army as attractive as possible, and no one can deny that the scheme is well calculated to do so. Very many of its officers will be Jews, and it is asserted that Captain the Hon. Neil Primrose will be among them. As is well known, Captain Primrose is the son of Lord Rosebery and his mother was a Rothschild. Meanwhile, Jewish soldiers continue to distinguish themselves, the latest honor recorded being that of a Victoria Cross to Private Jack White of Manchester. The V. C. is a comparatively rare distinction, awarded for conspicuous bravery, and White is the fourth Jew to receive the honor.

Jews in the United States ought to be informed that one of the peace proposals of the British Labor Congress refers to Jews and Palestine, and we make no apology for quoting it in full. It is the twelfth paragraph of the statement issued by the executive committee:

"The conference demands for the Jews of all countries the same elementary rights of tolerance, freedom of residence and trade, and equal citizenship that ought to be extended to all the inhabitants of every nation. But the conference further expresses the hope that it may be practicable by agreement among all the nations to set free Palestine from the harsh and oppressive government of the Turk, in order that this country may form a free state under international guarantee, to which such of the Jewish people as desire may return, and may work out their own salvation free from interference by those of alien race or religion".

Some little while ago we reported in this column that the University of Cambridge had refused the sum of £1,000 (say $5,000) for the purpose of founding a scholarship in Arabic, because Jews were expressly excluded from participating. This high-minded action of the university authorities so moved many Jews in this country that it was felt that the university should not be loser by its devotion to an ideal worthy of the highest praise. Accordingly the editor of the Jewish Chronicle undertook to collect £1,000, and in view of the cause, the money was quickly available, and presented to the university, where the gift has been much appreciated. Needless to add, the scholarship is to be open to all comers, and it will be associated with the name of the late Prof. William Wright, an Orientalist of more than local fame.

The London Lodge continues to develop slowly but surely. The system of arranging for prominent public men to address the lodge on aspects of the Jewish question has proved a great success, and will be continued. The war and war work naturally set a limit to the activities of the lodge in that several members are with the colors, and the leisure of those left behind is not great. Yet President Gilbert hopes to be able to cultivate the social side of our work, to some extent at any rate. The larger we grow, the more we want to know each other.

THE JUDGMENT OF NATIONS

It is futile to quarrel whether religion is for the individual or for the nation. To both it comes home during a crisis in their existence. Upon the high days in the life of every man, when the emotions are stirred by tidings glad or sad, when above all we stand at the crossroads overwhelmed by the stupendous consequences a step or misstep may involve, baffled by the uncertainty of what [illegible]y next moment may bring us, we [illegible]ed above the seen to the unseen, [illegible]fer ourselves to be sustained by [illegible]h that a benign Providence has [illegible]s keeping. And so it fares with nations in critical periods of their history, when an old chapter closes and a new is to be written, when momentous decisions are to be reached bearing upon the weal and woe of generations, when the hand that guides the rudder of state requires steadying, when vision is scarce amidst the perplexing multitude of counsels—it is then that the nation is tried as in a crucible and the nation's faith seeks contact with the true realities and the everlasting verities when the nation's fate hangs in the balance. The youngest interlocutor in the sacred poem of Job in the Scriptures and the liturgist who penned the section of "Remembrances" in the prayer on New Year's Day, both sum up the Jewish conviction that the destinities of men and of nations are in the hands of God, and that His judgment is for both; and in weirder colors the picture is drawn by that pious bard who like none other touched the deepest chords in portraying the majestic awe of the day of judgment which fills the very angels with trepidation and inspires hope in the breast of the earthborn man. And the underlying conviction is that nations may do wrong as well as individuals and that sentence is pronounced upon states and countries as well as upon the souls of men. The folly of nations must needs lead to their undoing, and a sin is not condoned when a state is the malefactor. Men of little faith cannot comprehend how God can tolerate carnage and ruthless devastation. God has not abdicated. He is not sitting idly by. He is the God of battles. This world is of His making. It is a world of passion and of greed, of sin and of depravation. Yet it is through these that the divine plan is to be carried to its goal, and that goal is a life purer and nobler and sweeter. We may become partners in the divine creation of the better future if we but see with His eyes and discern the ultimate good which the reign of evil is preparing and fashioning. Yet, at the judgment day which with tradition we assign to our New Year, the nations o[illegible] tremble. None is secure. N[illegible] for a certainty what the iss[illegible] gigantic struggle will be and [illegible] cially it will emerge from t[illegible] whether unscathed or shorn [illegible] sions and dignity. Some na[illegible] staked their very existence. [illegible] it is a question of possible dismemberment. What is this new year to bring to them all? There cannot be gain here unless there be loss there. Or shall the conditions which prevailed when the war was begotten return? Shall humanity stagger under the weight of armaments piled upon armaments? Shall there be only a respite for the struggle to recommence, with still greater holocausts of human lives and the wanton destruction of civilization reared by untold generations? Or shall a peace ensue, stable, enduring, making for security everywhere, for helpfulness among nations, for emulation in the peaceful arts and crafts, for a humanity purged of the evil conditions of strife at home and abroad? All these are questions momentous and baffling because of the uncertainty of the answer. Aye, the answer is beyond the ken of man. It is God's. For the judgment is God's. Be it remembered that in these days as at no other time the fate of the individual is bound up with the fate of nations. How many anxious mothers whose sons reared with no end of toil and care are now training their hands to warfare or perchance already battling at the front, would fain wrest the secret from the immobile sphinx to know whether their dear ones will return to their bosoms whole in body and soul or perhaps sleep their eternal sleep beneath the foreign soil! Woe to them who give themselves up to despair, who fail to grasp that the determination upon the part of a nation to surrender wealth and lives in order to win its rights and to make real its ideals, constitutes a nation's faith, faith in itself, faith in the supreme Ruler of nations. And a world war such as the present is, is a world judgment, God's judgment of the world. Both the man of faith and the nation of faith are the instruments of God for guiding those of little faith or of no faith aright. It is their mission above all to spread among men the conviction that God judgeth righteously and that righteousness is the goal of the judgment of nations.

BAITING THE ALIEN.

The chief magistrate of the land has told us that we have gone into the business of war for good reasons, grimly, seriously, meaning to set our shoulder to the wheel, intent upon forcing a decision, but withal free from rancor, malice, hate. And rightly so. Hatred is born of impotence. You hate the one who has thwarted your purpose, who balked you when he might have stood aside. Warring nations have a chivalrous regard for each other's valor. Moreover, individuals may quarrel and never cross each other's path again, but wars between nations, no matter how protracted, will terminate some day, and then relations will have to be resumed. Nothing, therefore, should be done that would bring the blush to a nation's face when the former foe is met again.

It may, for example, be advantageous in the interest of kindling the enthusiasm and the warlike spirit among his compatriots, for a returned diplomat to tell of his experiences at the enemy's Court. It may be that selling these experiences to a newspaper at so much per line is open to criticism as not being in good taste; that it were beter, if the government deemed it advisable to acquaint the people with the preliminaries which led up to the rupture, for the State Department to have laid before the people the official reports which it doubtless had in its archives, concerning these matters. But with this criticism, whether well founded or not, we have little concern.

When the same newspaper, however, indulges on every occasion in casting slurs upon certain elements of our mixed population it is time to sound a note of warning. With the advent of Russian freedom there has been an exodus of former emigrants from that hapless land back to their home. After all, the proportion is a small one. Publicists who believe in restricting immigration should welcome this sign, should realize that the influx from those quarters was largely due to intolerable political conditions, and that once the cause is removed there is no fear that we shall have any large immigration from eastern Europe. The majority, it is clear enough, did not and do not desire to go back, simply because they have grown accustomed to American conditions, because their children have been brought up in American schools and are now filling up the ranks of the newly made army that is to fight our battles. But the editor of the paper referred to, has noticed that those who hastened to return have maligned the land which had given them refuge. They told the Russian people that American freedom is not what it is supposed to be; they averred that all they learned here was how to organize strikes. We hold no brief for these people. We know their ilk. They are the irreconcilables who foment trouble everywhere, who incite class against class, who cherish their theories above the dictates of patriotism. Russia is just now full of them. It is they who are responsible for the breakdown in the morale of the Russian army. To condemn the mischief makers, whether native or foreign, is one thing, but to hold all aliens responsible for the acts of a few is quite another. Yet the editor points with scorn to the whole class of "certain" immigrants from Russia. We know whom he means. For lest we misunderstand the allusion, he refers us to Professor Ross' animadversion of some years ago. Why this hide and seek Why not come out into the open with the attack on the Russian Jew? Baiting the alien is a dangerous pastime. We are sorely in need of a united front. And so far as our observations go, the call to patriotism has been heeded by the alien quite as much as by the native. They may snarl at the foreign press. Here again it is unfair to generalize. Because a small portion of the foreign press has failed to show proper enthusiasm for America's interest, what right has any one to cast suspicion upon all? The foreign press will be able to take care of itself. But as for the Russian Jew, who is part and parcel of the citizenry of this land, the sins of a few, notwithstanding, we may without fear of contradiction answer for his unswerving loyalty. He is found among all strata of society. There are among them the haves and the have-nots, capitalists and laborers, employers and employes. His class interests will range him on the side of his like. Organized labor has the native stamp, so much so that it is inimical to free and unrestricted immigration. The immigrant of yesterday becomes the restrictionist of today. We Jews are quite used to have the offences of a few saddled upon us all. It is another case of defamation. And we stand up for the fair name of the alien Jew, the alien of yesterday. We have our share of thoughtless ingrates, but no more than have other elements of the population. Castigate them if you chose, but please do not dish up Professor Ross' calumnies. They have been disposed of as a disgruntled gentleman's unfounded fears, as the hasty generalizations of a careless and hostile observer. This country is not quite ready for anti-Semitism, least of all for the insidious kind that is afraid to call itself by that name openly and above board. We have no room here for baiting the alien.

THE AMERICAN SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' WELFARE LEAGUE OF THE I. O. B. B.

In answer to an insistent and growing demand from lodges and men influential in the ranks of the I. O. B. B., and mindful of the great need for soldier welfare service, the executive committee of the order, at a meeting held July 29 and 30, adopted a resolution asking for the appointment of a committee to carry out a plan whereby the spiritual, social and material needs of the soldiers and sailors and their dependent families may be properly attended to.

The task is one of the greatest undertaken by the order, and is in perfect keeping with its fundamental principle of instilling patriotism for our country and loyalty to our faith. There is no work at the present time that is greater than the labor which will insure victory for our forces. And the welfare work for soldiers is one of the fundamental needs of the day. It is becoming a more and more recognized fact that the life of the soldier outside of the camp contributes to his efficiency as a military man, and the more wholesome his life is made, the better is the soldier performing his function.

When the committee was organized. its chairman, Mr. Sigmund Livingston, went to Washington to interview the authorities there with regard to the plans. He was told that the work was extensive and important—so important that there could not be too many agencies in the field, provided the work was efficiently done. He visited the headquarters of the National War Service Commission, and there was again impressed with the importance of the work to be done.

The American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League was the result of the deliberate thought on the part of the officers of the order. Until the organization of the league no active work had been undertaken in any of the present camps or cantonments other than the holding of services by local rabbis. The task was larger than just this. It therefore organized to meet a necessary want, and to what extent it is meeting this want may be seen from another article in this issue.

It is confidently hoped that the appeals which have been sent out will meet with a generous response. A million dollars has been asked for. This sum is necessary to carry on the work as it has been planned. The extent of the good the B'nai B'rith can do in this field depends upon the generosity with which the appeal is met. It is hoped that the spirit of patriotism and service, and the loyalty of the membership to the order will prompt a response commensurate with the great work that the American Sailors' and Soldiers' Welfare League has undertaken.

ISAAC OSTHEIMER.

The Board of Governors of the B'nai B'rith Orphanage and Home for Friendless Children of District No. 3, at its annual meeting held July 15, 1917, received the sad information of the death of Isaac Ostheimer and of the kind and generous remembrance in which he held our beloved Home.

Isaac Ostheimer was a lifelong resident of Erie, and by his life of industry and integrity won a good name with the success that he achieved. He ever gave timely heed to the cry of the poor and distressed. From the time of the inception of our Home he was its liberal and consistent supporter in all of its undertakings.

His noble testament of charity, unexampled in the annals of our city for its broad spirit and unbounded generosity, will, through the blessing it will bring to thousands, keep his memory fresh in the minds of men for many years to come. His was a splendid illustration of the broad character of Jewish charity and will remain to lend honor to his name and to that of Jew.

Therefore, be it resolved, That in the death of Isaac Ostheimer, the B'nai B'rith Orphanage and Home for Friendless Children of District No. 3 lost a good friend and generous contributor; that in appreciation of his generous bequest to our Home his name be inscribed upon the memorial tablet soon to be erected in our Home; that this expression of our sorrow for his loss and appreciation of his friendship and kindness to our children be spread upon our minutes and a copy thereof sent with our sincere sympathy and respect to the members of his family.

Be it further resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be printed in the American Israelite, the Jewish Comment, the Jewish Criterion, the Jewish Exponent and the B'nai B'rith News.

JACOB BERLINER.

Jacob Berliner, one of the pioneer members of District No. 3, passed away at his home in Corry, Pa., on Thursday, June 14, after an illness of two weeks.

Jacob Berliner, together with his father, the late Meyer Berliner, organized Ahaveth Sholem Lodge, No. 160, on May 30, 1871. All through the years, when the membership dwindled, he maintained the lodge, acting as its secretary.

In 1880 he aided in the organization of the Beth Israel Synagogue in Corry.

Bro. Berliner was 67 years old and left his wife, Emily, and two sons, Manfred J. and Lawrence T., both active members of the I. O. B. B., also one brother, William Berliner of New York.

He was one of the oldest residents of Corry, coming to the city in 1864 with his father. They established the well-known firm of M. Berliner & Co., operating a sole leather tannery and dealing extensively in hides and skins. In later years the Berliner Company became known internationally in the leather and hide and fur trade.

Mr. Berliner accumulated a substantial fortune and contributed largely to various charities.

LARGE BEQUESTS TO CHARITY.

Late Isaac Ostheimer Distributes 80 Per Cent of His Estate to Jewish and Non-Sectarian Societies in Erie.

Mr. Isaac Ostheimer of Erie, Pa., who passed away on June 24 last bequeathed more than 80 per cent of his estate to charity, Jewish and non-sectarian, as follows: Property to the value of $80,000, and accumulated income to the Social Service Federation of Erie, a non-sectarian institution, for the purchase of a building to be known as the Isaac Ostheimer Home for Unemployed; $30,000 additional at the death of a legatee to revert to the Isaac Ostheimer Home for Unemployed to be used towards its maintenance. If at the end of five years the Social Service Federation of Erie has not accepted the above bequest and guaranteed maintenance, the property shall then be sold and with the proceeds a building shall be erected on the grounds of the B'nai B'rith Orphanage and Home for Friendless Children of District No. 3 to be known as "Isaac Ostheimer Orphans' Home" and of the $30,000 for the maintenance of the "Isaac Ostheimer Home for Unemployed" $15,000 is to go absolutely to the B'nai B'rith Orphanage and Home for Friendless Children of District No. 3.

Other bequests are: $5,000 to the Elmwood Home for Boys, of Erie, Pa.; $5,000 to the Boys' Club of Erie, Pa.; $5,000 to the Louise Home of Erie, Pa. These latter three are non-sectarian societies. Also unconditional bequests as follows: $15,000, B'nai B'rith Orphanage and Home for Friendless Children of District No. 3, Erie, Pa.; $2,500, Hebrew Sheltering and Immigrant Aid Society of New York City; $5,000, Denver Home for Consumptives; $5,000, Cleveland Jewish Orphan Asylum; and the following non-sectarian institutions; $5,000, Erie Home for Friendless; $2,500, Elmwood Home for Boys, Erie; $2,500, Elmwood Home for Girls, Erie; $2,500, Hamot Hospital, Erie; $2,500, St. Vincent's Hospital, Erie; $2,500, Florence Crittenton Home, Erie; $2,500, Old Ladies' Home, Erie; $2,500, Infants' Home, Erie; $2,500, Visiting Nurses' Association, Erie; $2,500, Boys' Club, Erie; $2,500, Louise Home, Erie; $2,500, Humane Society, Erie.

Mr. Ostheimer was a son of Jacob Ostheimer, a native of this city. An editorial in the local Evening Herald makes the following praiseworthy comment on the will:

"Far more enduring than storied urn or animated bust the monument which Isaac Ostheimer has erected to his memory will keep that memory green in the hearts of his fellow citizens in Erie.

"In devoting a large portion of his estate to charitable purposes, Mr. Ostheimer displayed the broadness of his philanthropy by making no distinction of race or creed, treating all alike and treating all generously. Nor did he confine his beneficence to his native Erie, remembering worthy objects which appealed to his sympathies in other cities.

"The Erie institutions, which will profit from Mr. Ostheimer's liberality, are among the most worthy which minister to the public benefit and all of which depend more or less upon public benevolence for their support.

"Isaac Ostheimer was a man who never posed and whose benevolences were so quiet as to attract little attention to his personality. Therefore, it is only at his death that his fellow citizens become fully aware of the breadth and depth of his philanthropy, and thousands who during his life perhaps never heard of Isaac Ostheimer will revere his memory, for he is truly among those whose good deeds for humanity entitle him to humanity's gratitude".

TESTIMONIAL TO RABBI A. H. SILVER.

A warm heart, a lofty soul finds expression in noble deeds. From the day you came into our midst, dear brother, you made manifest these qualities. At every turn your unselfish devotion to our common cause has not only resulted in material gain, but has been a stimulus and example for emulation to us all. It has fostered a spirit that will be enduring and the cause of endless good. The children of the B'nai B'rith Orphanage and Home for Friendless Children of District No. 3, the people of the district, the B'nai B'rith Lodge and the Board of Governors of the Home are grateful you have lived among us.

We are particularly reminded of your stirring words, zeal and endeavors at the B'nai B'rith Convention at Erie, when your enthusiasm and magnanimous promise led to such glorious conclusions; and later, of your indefatigable and untiring efforts in the fulfillment of your promise. We also know of some of your many quiet acts and the deep influence they will have.

District No. 3 keenly recognizes its loss in your leaving, but feels you will not forget us and that we will still have large share of your interest. The Board of Governors of the B'nai B'rith Orphanage and Home for Friendless children of District No. 3 congratulates Cleveland on being able to attract such a splendid leader and in your new field of endeavor wishes you unbounded success.

Resolved, That an engrossed copy hereof be transmitted to Rabbi Silver, that same be inscribed on the records of the board and be published in the American Israelite, Jewish Criterion, Jewish Exponent, B'nai B'rith News and Jewish Independent.

PROMISES EQUALITY FOR ROUMANIAN JEWS.

The Roumanian Premier Bistiano again repeated his promises for a speedy emancipation of the Jews of Roumania. This time, it was made, according to a London dispatch, to the Jewish morning Journal and a committee of the Russian Soldiers' and Peasants' Committee, headed by a M. Tissenhausen, that came o Roumania for this special purpose. The Premier assured the delegation that Roumanians have recently become convinced of the loyalty and patriotic devotion of the Jews and of their value as a component element of the population. Now, that Russia has become free, the fear that equality granted to the Roumanian Jews would attract large numbers of Russian Jews to Roumania, which was one of the arguments of the antisemite, no more exists. He had no doubt but that full equality will soon be granted to Jews by the Roumanian Parliament. He suggested that the Roumanian greatly resented the interference of foreigners in the fate of the Jews of their land. This interest in Jewish affairs on the part of trangers calls forth a feeling of prejudice mong the Roumanians which is injurious to the cause. He added, however, that there was nothing to fear from this resentment and that Jewish emancipation in Roumania will soon be a reality.

ROSH HASHONAH 5678.

American Jewry approaches the most solemn time in all the year. Rosh Hashonah of the year 5678 is the most portentous in modern times for Jewry throughout the world. Never has there been such widespread, fearful suffering. Many of our faith have died from starvation, from want. The new year will mean the death of many, many more, unless we in America come to their rescue. It is as though a black curtain spread itself before the eyes of our people in Russia, in Palestine, in Poland, in Roumania, in Lithuania, in Galicia and everywhere where war has wrought its havoc.

If, in other years, and more particularly since the beginning of the great war, we have approached the Holy Days in penitence, in humility and with prayers for forgiveness in our hearts, how much greater are the reasons that we should do so now! Behind the great curtain of death spread over Europe, to the West, is America, which may stand forth as did Aaron:—"He stood between the dead and the living and the plague was stayed".

Greater than any plague in all the world's history, is the plague of fire and steel, of starvation, of sickness, of want, which this great war has brought upon our people. America then must stand between the living and the dead as did Aaron and with its money generously contributed, save from the plague, the souls of its brothers and sisters in the war zones.

In the liturgy of Rosh Hashonah in the inspired words of Rabbi Amnon of Mayence, one of the deathless martyrs of our race, in his soul-stirring message, the U'nsane Tokef, we read:

"Again is it to be decreed who shall live and who shall die? Who shall perish by fire, who by sword? Who by hunger, who by thirst? Who shall have rest and who shall wander"? It is for American Jewry to determine the answer, as affecting those of our faith visited by a disaster they themselves are powerless to avert.

It is for us at the coming Yom Hadin —day of judgment—to be so ready with our gifts, as to have it decreed that we shall stand with the righteous and shall be counted as having acted in the true spirit of Zedokoh—right doing! Only in this way will countless lives be saved to Jewry and only in this way can we look forward to the coming year with hope and confidence for ourselves and for those whom we hold dear.

Our prayers, penitence, charity and right doing shall avert the catastrophe.

CONVERTED NEGRO JEW WINS HONORS.

A WORTHY APPEAL

May I, at the same time, ask you to have an appeal made through the B'nai B'rith News for magazines and reading matter to be sent to our boys abroad? If any of our brothers desire to send same on to New York, they may be sent to the Institutional Synagogue, 112 West 116th Street, New York City, from whence they will be sent abroad through arrangements that have been perfected with the War Department. Rabbi Herbert Goldstein has taken charge of this matter here but we need the help of all in order to make it a complete success.

With kindest regards, I am

Fraternally yours,
ISAAC SIEGEL.

THE RUSSIAN REVOLUTION AND THE JEWISH PEOPLE

"What can we expect of the [illegible] revolution? What will be [illegible] What its character"? These [illegible] tions asked by Dr. Schmarya [illegible] article in "Dos Yiddische Folk".

"Apriori, we accept it as a fact that the victory of the Russian revolution is a fact, and that the new regime is safe and secure. We will not enter into any philosophic research, but will rest the discussion of these questions upon a few facts. Russia is a state of nationalities, and with the proclamation of equal civil rights alone, no new government will have done its full duty toward the national minorities, which, under the old regime, suffered no less than the individual subject as such. The liberation of the individual subjects without the liberation of the national group, of which he is a part, is only a partial liberation, and a government aspiring to be modern and to exist upon a sound basis must not permit the prevalence of discontent among large masses. It is therefore difficult to conceive that the new Russian government, in which the liberal aspirations have such an important place, shall ignore the demands of the national minorities".

"We have sufficient evidence that permit us to believe that the new regime will exert every effort to adjust the question of nationalities in the Russian state, not on the basis of power and dominance, but on the basis of universal principles of justice and liberty. Just because Russia has been so late to pass through the refining process, it must introduce the most modern reforms".

"Furthermore, 11 years ago when, after the revolt of 1905, there was organized the Union for Equal Rights for Jews, earnest discussion took place as to the formulation of the Jewish demands, hardly one of the organizers of this union accepted the viewpoint of the assimilationists. There were a few who offered the counsel of prudence—the acceptance of civil and political rights and the relegation of the national question to a later period. This counsel was overwhelmingly rejected, and the program was formulated to include national, political and civil rights".

"If we take into consideration that 11 years ago, even though there was faith in the power and permanency of the new formula, it was clear that every liberalizing effort would still have to rockon with the same Czaristic government, still the representatives of the Jewish people were not affrighted and clearly formulated their national demands. If we take into further consideration that during the past 11 years the national consciousness of the Jewish people has been even more highly developed, and that now they are confronted by a new and liberal government—taking all this into consideration, we may anticipate that our brethren in Russia will now, with more firmness than ever, defend their national position".

DECLARATION BY ENGLAND REGARDING PALESTINE EXPECTED.

The Jewish Morning Journal's London correspondent is responsible for the statement that an official declaration by England regarding its intentions concerning Palestine is about to be made.

This opinion, says the correspondent, is held in the most reliable Zionist circles. Such a statement has been made necessary by the project to organize a specifically Jewish regiment. This regiment, it is expected, will undoubtedly be sent to the Palestine front, and the Jews who are volunteering by the hundreds daily are entitled to know, it is conceded, that the sacrifice they are prepared to make, even of their very lives, will be of service to their own people, as well as to England.

The same cable announces that Captain Neal Primrose, M. P., the youngest son of Lord Roseberry, has enlisted in the Jewish regiment. The mother of Neal Primrose is Hannah Rothschild, the daughter of the late Mayer Rothschild, who passed away in 1898. The sentiments of Neal Primrose, who is 35 years of age, are strongly Jewish, and as a Member of Parliament he has always defended Jewish interests. Indeed, during one of the many debates in which he has participated, he deemed it important to avow his Jewish origin and to express his pride over that fact.

THE FINNISH DIET AND THE JEWS.

The Finnish Diet has submitted the Jewish Emancipation Bill to the consideration of the Parliamentary Legislative Committee. The debate on the bill was utilized by the anti-Semitic Old-Finnish Party for the purpose of making an attack on Shechita. They are spreading pamphlets to emphasize their objections to it.

WHEREAS, Judaism proclaims the common Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man, and the Jewish people have ever loyally maintained this doctrine with all its implications, in the firm faith that all the nations of the earth would eventually fully realize its truth; and

WHEREAS, By reason of the wide diffusion of knowledge and education, of the close relations with one another into which the people of all nations have been brought by modern inventions, by international trade and commerce, and by the spread of all the arts and refining influences of civilization, the conditions which made for international wars in the past have in large measure been removed and nations have become interdependent; and

WHEREAS, The people of all nations seek equality of opportunity, rights and justice in their dealings with one another, and equality for all, justice and peace can be secured only by international co-operation; and

WHEREAS, It is the hope of the people of all nations that, at the close of the present war, some arrangement between nations may be effected whereby differences between them may be settled without resort to armed conflict, and the common sentiment for the abolishment of war, as the arbiter of international differences, is voiced by leading scholars, publicists and statesmen, by representatives of the people and by influential organizations actively working to that end; and

WHEREAS, The Jews in all lands would eagerly embrace the opportunity to co-operate zealously in support of a movement to prevent the recurrence of international wars,

Resolved, That District No. 1, Independent Order B'nai B'rith, respectfully requests the Executive Committee of the Order to issue a manifesto declaring that the Order will earnestly strive for the abolishment of war between nations and urging that upon the termination of the present world war all civilized nations join in conference and adopt for their governance a platform and code of international laws doing away for all time with all artificial barriers between their countries and peoples, securing equal rights for all people in all lands, prohibiting any hostile acts between nations by legislation, war or otherwise, and creating and providing for the maintenance of a body or bodies vested with authority and power to settle international disputes and adopt and enforce laws and decisions to accomplish the purposes of such international concert;

WHEREAS, The District, by reason of the wide extent of its territory within its jurisdiction, would be in no position to carry on a thorough and general propaganda without assistance from the Executive Committee, and that furthermore in years past, the District Presidents have given the Executive Committee accountings of propaganda expenditures, which, we were assured, were eminently satisfactory; therefore be it

There being no further business before the Committee the meeting adjourned sine die.

SHYLOCK SHOULD BE BANISHED.

Shakespeare is so big that he can be approached boldly, and thus boldly does the present writer consider a play that, in Elizabeth's time was wrong, that in our era is a preservative of evil social and religious bacteria, and that should for the sake of universal cheerfulness be forgotten. This writer holds no brief for the Jewish people, but he has a strong conviction that they are right in resenting this once popular dramatic pilloring of their race and, while he recognizes the wonderful dramatic value of "The Merchant of Venice," he is inclined to question even the theater's right to perpetuate a social injustice.—Charles Henderson in Cleveland Plain-Dealer.

"Judenstaat" he would probably have been one of the most ardent supporters of the Zionist movement. He was indeed quite an admirer of Moritz Hess (1811-1875), whose pamphlet, "Rom und Jerusalem", proclaimed in 1862 practically the principle which is underlying Herzl's "Judenstaat", though Herzl had no knowledge of it when he published his phenomenal essay. Hess in turn received a great deal of his inspiration from Graetz's history, part of which he translated into French.

The national conception of Judaism involved Graetz in a lawsuit, which is of more than personal interest. He contributed to the Vienna Jewish Almanach, edited by Leopold Kompert, an essay entitled "The Rejuvenation of the Jewish Nation". In this essay he presents the idea that the Servant of the Lord, spoken of in the second part of Isaiah as an innocent sufferer, whose tribulations are to be a redemption of all nations on earth, and who is destined to lasting glory, is the people of Israel. In other words, the Messiah of the Prophets is not an individual, but the people of Israel. This statement was a clear challenge of the fundamental dogma of Christianity. The essay appeared in 1863. Austria was then in the midst of a struggle for the overthrow of clerical domination, which had reached its climax in the concordat of 1855. The champion of clericalism in Vienna was a priest, named Sebastian Brunner, the editor of the "Kirchenzeitung". Graetz's essay was a godsend to the clerical publicist. He could prove by it that Judaism was the implacable enemy of Christianity, that it was the aggressor, while it constantly complained of persecution. The national means of procedure would have been to demand the prosecution of Graetz and of his publisher for an attack on Christianity. This, however, would have been fanaticism, and an inquisitorial procedure. Brunner, therefore, turned the tables and demanded of the public prosecutor, Lienbacher, a clerical politician, that he institute proceedings against Graetz, who had ridiculed the belief in a personal Messiah, and thus insulted Judaism, which was a religion entitled to the protection of the state. The details are not interesting to us, for the procedure against Graetz, who lived outside of the jurisdiction of Austria's courts, was a mere formality. The publisher was fined under a technical charge. The orthodox Jews, however, had a new proof that Graetz was a heretic.

This nationalistic attitude shows us Graetz as a romanticist. And a romanticist he was also in his history. This undoubtedly contributed considerably to his success. The average reader does not like dry historical facts. They are not interesting enough. Graetz supplied this craving for romance very liberally. He begins his work with the statement that Abraham arrived in Palestine on a beautiful spring morning. There is absolutely no authority for this statement, but it reads well. To illustrate this same tendency by a fact from modern history, we point to the statement that King Frederick William II signed the edict of March 11, 1812, which recognized the Jews of Prussia as citizens on the anniversary of his wife's death, touched by the manifestations of sympathy exhibited by his Jewish subjects. In this case we can prove that the statement is pure fiction. The question of improving the condition of the Jews had occupied the government since the death of Frederick the Great in 1786, and the law which finally solved the question was drafted nearly two years before its promulgation was approved by the king a few days before he put his signature to it, when he sent it back to his cabinet, demanding a few insignificant mostly verbal alterations. So Graetz's statement that he had it for some time on his desk, was always undecided, until finally the memory of his wife softened his heart, is devoid of all foundation. Quite in contrast with this romanticism is Graetz's indifference to modern Hebrew literature, and his bitter antagonism to Yiddish. This again shows the difficulty of historic interpretation of movements and characters. The young Polish Jew, who had acquired secular aducation, felt that Yiddish singled him out as a sort of barbarian. The old man never overcame that feeling which filled his soul when he was longing to emerge from the narrowness of the Beth Hamidrash of Zerkov, with its queer rabbi, who lived as if he still were under Polish domination in the seventeenth century.

Personally Graetz represented rather the type of his early environment by his unconventional attitude, which also may explain his aversion to modern synagogue reform. He never wrote out his lectures, he spoke in a colloquial tone, often interspersed with humorous remarks, and exhibiting the [illegible] emancipated Talmudist at [illegible] especially in his exegetical [illegible] which, as his works prove, he [illegible] the most radical school. In [illegible] to his students he was always [illegible] the wide acquaintance which he enjoyed through his popularity as author, was often at the disposal of his pupils and friends. His picture, found as the frontispiece of his history, rather flatters him. Nothing in his appearance betrayed the man of genius. His domestic life was charming, and his wife, to whom he dedicated one volume of his history, was a most charming hostess. Her devotion to her husband was tragically demonstrated in the last years of her life. She survived him for nine years, but almost during the whole time, her mind was a blank. Life had no meaning to her after the loss of the man who had inscribed his name in indelible letters on the pages not only of Jewish history, but also in the annals of historic science. His oldest son, Leo, born in 1856, has achieved a remarkable fame as author on electric engineering. He is professor of this branch at the University of Munich. A grandson of his, Franz Cohn, the son of his only daughter, is professor of gynaecology at the University of Greipswald. Should we see in this evolution a typical feature of modern Judaism? Are we to pass from the isolation of the Beth Hamidrash to "Jewish science", and from that to secularism, which may absorb us physically, as it is absorbing us spiritually? History alone will give a definite answer.

A few remarks may be added on his attitude to Germany and Christianity, a subject extremely delicate at this present moment. Up to 1870 little attention was paid to this side of Graetz's literary attitude. The national excitement following the French War aroused strong animosity against the classic Jewish historian by the charge that he was hostile both to Christianity and to Germany. It cannot be denied that in speaking of the persecutions of Judaism by the mediaeval church, he was often carried away by his emotion. No warm hearted Jew could ever be expected to preserve the calmness of mind in dealing with this subject. It must be admitted, however, that some of his remarks are unnecessarily biased. Speaking, for instance, of the battle between the followers of Maimonides' rationalism and their orthodox opponents, which have their analogy in contemporaneous church history, Graetz (VII, 241, 3 ed.) says that on the Jewish side it was a battle for ideals, while within the church it was a struggle for power and mammon. Presenting the movement for emancipation in France, Graetz sees liberalism only on the French side, while on the German side he sees merely narrowmindedness and Philistinism. We all have our limitations, but the popularity of Graetz's work even now, twenty-six years after his death, and the fact that Jost's work was outside of the rank of technical scholars forgotten, in 1886, is the verdict of history on the great historian of Judaism.

ENGLAND WILL SEND JEWISH BRIGADE TO PALESTINE.

An entire brigade of Jewish soldiers may shortly be sent by England to participate in the fighting in Palestine, under command of Colonel Patterson of the famous Zion Mule Corps, composed of Jewish refugees from Palestine, which won distinction for valor in the ill-fated campaign at Gallipoli. This information is contained in a special cable from London to the Jewish Morning Journal of New York City. which reads as follows:

"London, Aug. 8.—The organization of the Jewish regiment which is being organized by the British army, and which will bear as its distinguishing mark the six-cornered star of Judaea on a background of blue and white, is proving a great success. This regiment is being organized by Colonel Patterson, who was the commander of the famous Zion Mule Corps which he organized in Egypt, and which participated so valorously in the Dardanelles campaign. Large numbers of Jewish officers and soldiers in the British army have asked for transfers to this regiment and hosts of volunteers are swarming to the recruiting office.

"The number of volunteers indicates that it may be possible to recruit a brigade and even a complete division. Although no official statement has yet been made by the British Government as to its intentions with regard to this new military development, the prevailing opinion is that it will be sent to the Palestine front.

"The Jewish soldiers will be accompanied by a complete corps of Jewish nurses, and provisions are being made by the British army office to make it possible for the Jewish regiment or brigade to observe the Mosaic dietary laws."

Forty-Ninth Annual Convention of District Grand Lodge No. 6

On July 2 and 3, 1917, District Grand Lodge No. 6 held its Forty-ninth Annual Session at Ottawa Beach, Mich.

The Convention was opened by the President, Bro. Edward Sonnenschein, in the presence of more than ninety delegates and Past Presidents of the District Grand Lodge.

The following resolutions were adopted by the Convention:

The activities of the various philanthropic institutions maintained and supported by the Order, such as the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives at Denver, Leo N. Levi Memorial Hospital at Hot Springs, Educational League of Cleveland and the B'nai B'rith Free Employment Bureau of Chicago, were commended, and the lodges of the District and their members were urged to continue to the full measure of their ability, their support towards these worthy causes.

Regarding the care of tubercular patients in Denver, it was further resolved, that the National Jewish Hospital and the Jewish Consumptive Relief Society of Denver, Colo., be liberally supported by all Jews both morally and financially, to a greater extent than at the present time, so that proper care can be given to ex-patients.

As to the Educational League, it was resolved that each lodge of the District appoint a committee of three of its members of which the President of the Lodge shall be one, who shall act as local representatives of the League in furthering its work.

The uniform observance of Memorial Day in honor of the departed brothers on a date to be fixed by the General Committee was approved and an appropriate ritual for such memorial services was adopted.

As to the work of the Central B'nai B'rith Councils, it was resolved that adequate appropriation be made by the Grand Lodge for carrying on the work of the Councils for the coming year and that some officer of the Grand Lodge be charged with the duty of supervising and promoting the organization and activities of such Councils.

The work of the Anti-Defamation League was highly commended and the lodges of the District urged to have Standing Committees appointed to aid the League in its work in all matters pertaining to their local communities.

The establishment of additional free employment bureaus in larger communities and the centralization of their work by means of inter-communal relationship was recommended.

The work of the Social Service Committee in the District was approved, and it was resolved that for the coming year the District, along Social Service lines, devote its efforts to the Big Brother Movement. Summer camps for Jewish boys in large communities and the undertaking of some kind of Social Service activity in connection with military camps and cantonments was recommended.

As to Propaganda, it was resolved that a B'nai B'rith manual be issued setting forth briefly the history, aims and the achievements of the Order; that at certain periods of the year a bulletin be issued to the lodges setting forth the recent activities of the Order; that arrangements be made so that every lodge in the District be visited at least once during the year by some representative of the Grand Lodge; that the lodges be urged, during the coming year, to bring their organization up to the greatest strength and efficiency.

In connection with Intellectual Advancement work, it was resolved that the lodges hold public meetings which shall be open to non-members, thereby being the means of solidifying the Jewish spirit in many communities; that submission of subjects for discussion to the various lodges by the Director of Intellectual Advancement be continued and that such subjects be accompanied by syllabi and bibliographies and in addition to such syllabi the Director of Intellectual Advancement may choose his own subjects for discussion, and that he prepare an essay upon the subjects of "Patriotism" and the "Upholding of Judaism."

As a result of the appeal for contributions to the War Relief Fund the sum of $9,806.08 was secured.

The per capita tax for the ensuing year was fixed at $2.00 per member.

A Jewish Republic

By H. Eliassof

The stirring events of our turbulent times, which crowd upon each other in rapid succession, again emphasize the old lesson of history, that there is no absolute evil in the world. Even the present war, which is the most destructive war of all times, is not writing a history of horrors, of blood and tears only, but is also indicting a history of hope and redemption, of liberty and independence. It has already given birth to the Russian revolution, which has redeemed millions of men from abject slavery and opened wide for them the gates of a life of freedom, full of hope and promise to work out a glorious destiny. It is now also almost certain that this great war will soon solve one of the most perplexing Jewish problems, which has baffled for a long time the wisest Jewish leaders and the most learned Jewish teachers, in a manner which will fill the heart of every Jew with great joy and happiness. For many years Jewish culture, Jewish learning and literature have been on the decline in the midst of modern Jewry and most earnest endeavors on the part of the Jews to revive them have proved futile. The anxiety aroused in the hearts of the Jews by this dismal failure at last gave birth to the Zion movement, conceived by the late Theodor Herzl, of Vienna, the author of the "Judenstaat" and "Altneuland." The adherents of Zionism concentrated their hopes for the revival of Jewish culture in an independent Jewish State in Palestine, where an intellectual Jewish center was to be established, which would become an inspiration to the entire Jewry of the world and would rescurrect the old love of the Jew for Jewish thought and Jewish tradition. But the Zionism of Herzl, the dreamer, failed to impress the advanced Jews because they could not see in the new movement any practical possibilities, for they did not believe that the great powers would permit the Jews to acquire Palestine and to build up there an independent Jewish State. Then came this war. Czardom in Russia, the greatest stumbling stone on the road to Jewish political independence, fell, and suddenly a new aspect was given to Zionism. It now looks as if Herzl's dream may after all soon become a reality. England is making great headway in the Orient, the English forces have entered Palestine and the chances are that they will soon gain full possession of the country. Reports are being circulated on all sides, that England, the strongest power of the Entente Allies, is earnestly contemplating the creation of a Jewish Republic in Palestine, as a buffer state to guard the road to Egypt, under her own protection or as a protectorate of the United States.

It is reported that Sir Archibald Murray, commander of the British army, which has invaded Palestine and has advanced to within twenty-five miles of Jerusalem, has issued the following report:

"The Palestine plateau, once we have occupied it will be easy to defend. It could be held with ease by a comparatively small force, which could be reinforced at leisure.

"What should we do with Palestine, thus liberated from the century-old Turkish grip? There can be little doubt that we should revive the Jewish Palestine of old, and allow the Jews to realize their dreams of Zion in their homeland.

"All the Jews will not return to Palestine, but many will do so. The new Jewish State, under British or French aegis, would become the spiritual and cultural center of Jewry throughout the world. The Jews would at least have a homeland and a nationality of their own. The national dream that has sustained them for a score of centuries and more will have been fulfilled".

It has also been reported that Mr. Balfour, England's Minister of Foreign Affairs, who recently paid a visit to this country at the head of an English commission, had discussed the question of establishing an independent Jewish Republic in Palestine, under the protection of the United States, with President Wilson.

The London "Daily News," the Manchester "Guardian," and other important English newspapers, as well as such prominent Englishmen as Sir Harry Johnston, the noted traveler and explorer, recently gave the same answer as did Sir Archibald Murray, to the question, "What to do with Palestine?"

A British committee, consisting mainly of non-Jews, has lately been formed at Manchester, whose aim is to further the acquisition of Palestine as an integral portion of the English Empire and the establishment in the country of a Jewish State.

And so it seems that the establishment of a Jewish Republic in Palestine may be really consummated at no distant future. This is surely a cheering prospect for the successful solution of the aggrieving Jewish problem of the revival of Jewish culture, which every Jew must greet with a joyful heart.

The Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, which always heartily endeavors to advance Jewish culture, certainly shares with full satisfaction in this golden hope which now fills every Jewish soul. The Independent Order of B'nai B'rith long ago pointed out the way to unite the House of Israel upon a non-partisan platform. The lodge rooms of the Order have become in all parts of the old and the new worlds the temples, the sanctuaries of a refined and ennobled Jewish life because from its very beginning the Order had wiped out among its members all lines dividing Jew from Jew. In the meeting halls of the B'nai B'rith the Orthodox Jew and the Reform Jew stand on a common platform which embraces the best and the highest thoughts and teachings of Jewish culture. They are inseparably united by the threefold tie of "Benevolence, Brotherly Love and Harmony", and zealously work for the material and spiritual welfare of Kol Yisrael, the whole people of Israel. Israel's leaders, who are eager and anxious to accomplish the complete revival of Jewish culture through the independent Jewish State in Palestine, will only have to follow in the footsteps of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith when the great time arrives, to give the glorious Jewish hope a substantial basis, a foundation of permanent existence. Then will the words of our immortal prophet Isaiah become true, and "out of Zion shall go forth the law and the word of God from Jerusalem"—the law of righteousness and the word of truth—which are the two strong pillars of Judaism, the true Jewish culture whose lights once shone and whose fires once flamed upon the holy hills of Zion.

May God speed the happy day when the golden glow of Jewish culture will again be kindled into a bright blaze of glory upon the sacred mountain tops of Zion, to send their effulgent rays into the Jewish souls in all the ends of the earth.

B'NAI B'RITH.

Every man within the ranks of Israel should be a member of the B'nai B'rith. There is probably no other organization that has done and is doing as much for the advancement of Judaism as this fraternity.

It aims to inspire its members to become a blessing to mankind, and with this end in view it has established institutions for the care of the orphans, the sick and the aged and infirm. It is untiring in its efforts to secure justice for those of our unfortunate brethren who have been denied the rights that justly belong to them. Large numbers have enjoyed the benefits of the educational institutions that the order has established.

Not being content with the vast philanthropic work that it is doing, the B'nai B'rith, through the Anti-Defamation League, has become the defender of the good name of our people. Previous to the formation of the league no opportunity was spared to ridicule our co-religionists. The investigations of the league have usualy met with desirable results, and as a general thing it has been ascertained that these distasteful references to our co-religionists have generally been the result of ignorance rather than prejudice. The protests of the league have always been made in a dignified manner, and that is the reason they have been received with favor.

The order is a great factor in establishing that feeling of brotherly love among the members and this naturally does much to strengthen Israel, for it is unity among our people that is the cornerstone of power.—Jewish "Review".

ENGLISH STATESMAN PLEADS FOR JEWS.

In the organ of the British Palestine Society, "Palestine," Mr. J. C. Wedgwood appeals to his readers in behalf of the Jews, who as he says are among the "small" nationalities for whose rights and liberty the British are fighting. He suggests an autonomous Jewish state in Palestine under the protection of a great power. He believes that such a solution is for the benefit of the European great powers, as well as of the Orient itself. Mr. Wedgwood is an influential member of the English Parliament.

WOMEN AS GUARDIANS By Julia Salinger

(Translated for the B'nai B'rith News from "Report of the Grand Lodge for Germany")

In the progressive perception of our time, the century of the child, the watching over and caring for the young, has always been considered a necessity. But only the years of the war have brought so near to us the pressing need to solve the problem, so that today there can hardly be anything more important than the work of taking care of the children during the war, especially of the war orphans. What can be closer to us women than the solicitude for the helpless youths? Many times has the importance of these duties been pointed out also in this paper. I have reference to the articles about foster parentage by Dr. Alfred Cohn, and about war orphans' care by Commercial Counsellor Joseph Baum.

Today I would call the attention of the woman's world to a field of social care for the youths, which lies nearer to woman's nature than any other one does. Since the time when the civil law in Germany has first permitted women to act as guardians, a wide field of fruitful and valuable work has opened itself for them. Notwithstanding this fact, they have not yet occupied themselves generally with the duties of guardianshhip, and on account of inexperience and the feminine shyness to come in contact with the courts, they are frightened away from taking upon themselves a guardianship over their own or children of strangers. But today it is absolutely necessary to overcome this timidity and to instruct themselves in the plain duties of a guardian, which every conscientious and faithful person, man or woman, is able to fulfill. Why, then, is the woman so specially qualified for the office of guardian? And does there, on the whole, really exist a need for feminine guardianships? The last question must implicitly be answered in the affirmative, for only too frequently the lack of qualified guardians and legal wardens for minors is being complained of. How many a dependent, destitute mother has to suffer from the want of interest or convenience of the guardian of her child, and how often does it happen to those illegitimate children, who are just the very ones most in need, that the guardian quickly fails when it comes to obtaining alimonies? Who would finally blame the man who is overburdened with work for failing so quickly to do his duty? The guardianship is, anyway, only a burden for most people, which they were forced to take upon themselves. Therefore the duty of the woman comes in here to make up for the deficiency in the activity of the men by her co-operation in this field, for out of the peculiar nature of the woman emanates her capacity for this office. The woman possesses the gift of quick perception; with her motherly feeling she penetrates at once also entangled conditions, and recognizes, I might say, intuitively, the most fit conditions of life for those entrusted to her care. Have the women proved efficient in the years since the law permits them to act as guardians? Even if the percentage of feminine guardians was comparatively small in the beginning, and is perhaps still so today, it is not altogether their fault. Partly the courts of wards carried out the law with mistrust, for only the necessity, the lack of qualified men, forced them to it. But in all places where women were admitted to guardianship they have made good and have convinced the most resisting judge of the warden's court by the earnestness and zeal with which they have performed their duties. Today the Union for Women's Guardianship in Berlin and the Union for Protection of the Rights of Women, which is spread over the whole of Germany, see to it that qualified women are found everywhere for guardianships and that they also receive the plain legal knowledge which they need for it. For no price in the world would I like to fall under the suspicion that I wish to extol the woman guardian at the expense of the man guardian, but it is self-understood that the above-mentioned organizations who take the trouble to find qualified women guardians have made their choice very carefully in order to prevent a few unqualified ones from establishing themselves somewhere as the type of woman guardians and on the other side it must be admitted that women who volunteer to serve as guardians work more joyfully and more profitably than a man who is often unwilling and overburdened with professional duties.

In this way the educated woman can accomplish very important social work as guardian or warden and wield in the way of training an influence not only upon her ward but also upon its mother or foster mother. And in doing this she is not only the one who gives, but she also receives values, for the assumption of these duties and the understanding of the conditions of the life of the ward, which grows out of it, become a school of knowledge, especially for the woman of the big city, who very often has no conception of the sufferings of the masses. Therefore, the women of our lodges, who nearly everywhere stand at the side of the men in the very front rank in charity and social work, must take up this thankful and prominent work of care and training as guardian or warden, a work which agrees as no other does with the motherly feeling of the woman and at the same time answers the need of the time.

The Ladies' Auxiliary of the Berlin Lodges (President, Mrs. Minna Schwarz), as well as the Ladies' Auxiliaries of Lessing Lodge of Breslau (President, Mrs. Toni Peiser) and of the Amicitia Lodge in Posen (Delegate, Mrs. Jenny Leichtentritt), renew the proofs in their annual reports how indefatigably and warm-heartedly the women who belong to the lodges fulfill their obligations to the fatherland, notwithstanding the long duration of the war. In all the three lodges at the side of the war work, the work of peace is not neglected, and even if the first appears as the typical picture, like the sending of friendly gifts in money and various other necessities to the German soldiers at the front and to the destitute co-religionists, especially in Poland. That the Hospital Train and the wounded in the infirmaries are also thought of evidences the adjustment of the usual peace work to the difficult conditions of the war time, the first of which assumes a different form in each city. So does the Ladies' Auxiliary of the Berlin Lodges concentrate its main efforts upon the care of poor lying-in women and their nursing infants, and they really accomplish a model work in their beautiful new home. In the past year 138 women found admittance there, while in the Mothers' and Children's Home 83 women about to become mothers and 106 children were counted. A head nurse, assisted by a younger nurse, manages the home and also trains young girls in taking care of nursing infants. Three ladies have already finished their apprenticeships.

The Ladies' Auxiliary of Lessing Lodge has succeeded through the thanks-deserving support of the magistracy of Breslau, in taking off a part of the burden of care from the shoulders of many poor Jewish families of Breslau, by supplying them with provisions which were partly not to be obtained in the open market and which today are necessary for the support of a numerous family. In the summer months a number of needy, ailing children were partly sent to salt baths and to the country, while the remaining ones were formed into a city colony of about 60 children who were able to show surprising good results. Eating meals together daily, playing in the afternoons and pleasure in the open air joined with the evening meal resulted in four weeks in a weight increase of from 2 to 11 pounds, a not-to-be-underestimated gain in health for these children, most of whose fathers are in the field and whose mothers have to work for a living.

The Ladies' Auxiliary of Amicitia Lodge paid special attention to the Jewish wounded in the infirmaries, they visited them and arranged for them, as well as for all the Jewish soldiers staying in Posen, pleasant sociable hours in the lodge rooms. When the B'nai B'rith Hospital Train stayed in Posen a joyful Purim festival was arranged for the four nurses and the sanitary personnel of the train, together with the Jewish soldiers of the Posen garrison, about 90 persons. The president of the lodge opened the festival with an address. As the Vacation Home of Posen has been turned into a Convalescent Home for soldiers, a city colony took here, too, the place of the vacation colony of peace times with good results. The entertainments in the afternoons for working girls were postponed to Sunday and by this the gain was made that the number of girl visitors on this free afternoon was considerably increased in comparison with the previous number of visitors. Under the active help of the Ladies' Lodge it became possible that a Nurses' Home could be opened in the middle of May with four nurses who had been trained by the aid of the Grand Lodge. How necessary this home was is evidenced by the fact that all the four nurses are plentifully busy. The founding and security of this home, which to all appearances is developing into a veritable blessing for the population, was made possible by the united work of Amicitia Lodge, the Jewish congregation and the two societies for the nursing of the sick of Posen.

The Jewish Chautauqua Society

Following the urgent appeal of the United States Commissioner of Education, Hon. P. P. Claxton, the Jewish Chautauqua Society inaugurated work in the Summer schools of the universities throughout the country, in the Summer of 1909. Professor Claxton, following the advancements of every educational movement, regarded the efforts of the Jewish Chautauqua Society as the best agency to create a better understanding among the American people, as to what the Jew has been and has contributed to the advancement of the world. Thousands of students in attendance at these Summer schools are given a clearer and more accurate knowledge concerning the Jewish people, and many errors and prejudices are dispelled. The results of the instruction and lectures given under the auspices of the Chautauqua have been received with most gratifying commendation.

The Eighth Annual report of the work has just been received.

Rabbi Louis Wolsey, of Cleveland, Ohio, delivered three lectures at the University of Michigan on the "Modern Jew": (a) A Problem of Race, Nation or Religion. (b) Zionism and the Jewish Mission. (c) Jew and Gentile—to an audience which daily grew in attendance, until the closing lecture taxed the capacity of the auditorium.

"Does the modern Jew represent a nation, a race or simply a religion? He is a Jew, but as to his nationality there is no question—he is an American. The Jew should be considered as a race and not as a nationality. The Jewish classics have always been exponents of religion. The Jew has a genius for religion, and his history is almost exclusively a religious history.

"In Judaism, the Bible has never been closed, for every phase of Jewish history and literature since the time of the Bible has been held in the same reverence as the Bible itself. The literature which the Jew wrote in the middle ages is exceedingly rich, and even today his literary contributions, and activities have a certain vigor which neither age, nor persecution, nor misunderstanding has been able to destroy. In America, the Jewish religious activity is exceptionally vital.

"The religious problem of the Jew will be found in many respeits to parallel the problems that obtain in Christianity. The Jew has his agnostic, and his materialist, as has the Christian, and in this respect the Jew and the Christian alike may be able to learn of one another, as to how to win the unbeliever, and make religion a vital factor in the life of the individual."

Rabbi Eli Mayer, of Philadelphia, delivered a lecture at the State College of Pennsylvania, on "The Jew and the Bible," to an audience of 600, and emphasized the humanity of the Bible as the life of the Jew, and not merely as a piece of literature. As such it is a holy and inspired book, but not infallible. Sequential to this, must then be recognized the truth that the Jew did not cease to give voice to holy, spiritual thoughts with the close of the Bible, but that building upon it, he has reared and continues to raise aloft even more glorious monuments of the divine idealism that pulsates within him. Recognizing then that the Jew is such an idealist, he appealed for the elimination of the unjust and untrue attitude that the Jew is essentially a legalist and worships merely the letter of the Bible. 'The true Jew is he who strives to write ever more inspired Bibles, and his millenial history proves it. It may be regrettable that there are differences in religious and spiritual values, but since there are, and they seem to be thorough-going, he asked for support for the platform of dicerences, but in a spirit of honesty, rather than uniformity on a substratum of hypocrisy."

Rabbi Abram Simon, of Washington, D. C., at the University of Syracuse, delivered three lectures on "Jewish Education": (a) Education in the Biblical Era. (b) Education in the Talmudic Era. (c) Education in the Middle Ages—to an audience, the opening session 175, the second lecture to 300, and the closing one, the hall crowded to its seating capacity. The character of the attendance was most interesting—fifteen Jewish boys in khaki from the neighboring camp, local ministers, Christian Sunday School teachers and resident Jews of Syracuse, were in attendance at the three lectures.

Rabbi David Lefkowitz, of Dayton, Ohio, at the University of North Carolina, lectured on (a) "Literature of the Maccabean Period", (b) The Oral Tradition and Its Literary Expression in the Mishna, (c) Legalism and Ethics of the Talmud, and had an attendance of over three hundred. Beside the three lectures scheduled, he delivered one at the morning chapel, to all students at the Summer school, and held an audience of 1,000. It was enthusiastically received and those in attendance received a new orientation as to Jewish culture, life and religion. At the conclusion of each lecture conferences were held, indicating the live interest awakened. Many of the university faculty, denominational ministers and professors were in attendance.

Rabbi Louis Witt, of Little Rock, delivered a course of lectures on Jewish Ceremonials and Customs, at the University of Virginia, and stated the Synagogue originated a democratic and a spiritual, as opposed to a priestly and ceremonial worship in the world, pointing out at the same time how the synagogue fathered the worship of the church. Then followed two lectures on "Symbols of the Synagogue and the Home," with concrete illustrations in the shape of models, the Menorah, the Shofar, etc. Two lectures were delivered on Holy Days, one on the Torah in the sense of Israel as the people of Torah. The final lecture on the spiritual aspects of Pharisaic and Orthodox Judaism, culminating in Reform Judaism. So successful were these lectures that he was invited to deliver a lecture to the student body, during the assembly hour on "Jesus from the Standpoint of a Liberal Jew."

Rabbi Louis J. Kopald, of Buffalo, at the University of Nebraska, delivered a course as follows: (a) Cradle of Israel, (b3 Prayer in the Bible and the Jew of Today, (c) Religious Liberalism as Interpreted by the Jew, (d) The Jewish Attitude Toward Jesus. The opening lecture was delivered to an audience of 90, and was received with such marked interest that the second lecture was held in the large campus auditorium, with a constantly increasing attendance. The local press in commenting on his address, "The Attitude of the Jew Toward Jesus", says: "Instead of following the beaten track of the religious or sectarian controversalist, or even the pleader, he took the high ground of the unbiased investigator, and the tolerant interpreter even of views not his own. Such lectures are of great help to Jew and Christian alike, and by such a message, the rabbi has rendered a fine service to our university and to the community as well".

Thus through the efforts of the Jewish Chautauqua Society ,a place of recognized academic importance is being secured for Jewish students in the curriculum of higher learning. The testimony as to the helpfulness of this noteworthy activity is the strongest indication of its value, and the amplest justification of its existence. The directors of these different Summer schools have expressed in most enthusiastic letters to the Chautauqua Society, their earnest desire for continued co-operation in these lecture courses, and that each lecturer left a fund of knowledge both informing and interesting. The lecturers write the society: "You are doing a very wonderful work in sending out our men under your auspices to these various universities. It really is the great boon to American Judaism, for I cannot conceive of any way quite equal to this which could be devised for the familiarizing of the American public with the content and thought and activity of Judaism. They do much to clarify the Jew before the American public, and are sledge hammer blows at prejudice." "I feel that no activity of the Jewish Chautauqua Society can be fruitful of so many diverse and good results". "I must congratulate you on fostering a movement that on the basis of education and enlightenment is so effectually extending the ground of tolerance and fellowship on which Jew and non-Jew may stand".

JAFFA HEBREW GYMNASIUM.

The Jaffa Hebrew gymnasium is maintaining its existence in spite of prevailing conditions and of terrible difficulties. Its activities are necessarily curtailed, the institution having only 446 students and 27 teachers. The students who graduated last term were not given any final examinations, but certificates were issued to them on the basis of their year's work. All the graduates entered the school for officers at Constantinople. Recently the Turkish Inspector of Education in Palestine, Djemal Bey, visited the gymnasium and once more expressed his extreme satisfaction at the excellent results obtained by the institution.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

B'NAI B'RITH OF CLEVELAND.

A farewell speech to the B'nai B'rith members who are leaving for military training camps by Rabbi A. H. Silver was the feature of the annual reunion and outing of Cleveland Lodge, held on Aug. 9 at the Euclid Beach Park. A patriotic demonstration preceded the rabbi's address.

Several hundred children from Camp Wise were present at the affair and were taken to the beach in automobiles. Members of the order from lodges at Akron, Toledo and Youngstown were also in attendance.

A scout exhibition for the loving cup offered by the lodge, a tug of war, races and dancing constituted the program.

The musical given by Cleveland Lodge on Saturday evening, June 24, was an unqualified success. The program opened with a monologue from "The Christian", presented by Miss Lillian Abrams. Mrs. J. Nagusky, pianist, and Dr. Howard Maxwell, vocalist, were also on the program and the performance will be long remembered for its excellence. Miss Camille Kornfeld gave a violin solo and the appreciation of the audience was fully shown by the tremendous applause which greeted her. One of the stars of the evening was Miss Ruth Wieland-Lehman, who delighted those present with her remarkably sweet voice.

A B'nai B'rith Dramatic Club was organized under the auspices of Cleveland Lodge No. 16. Meetings of the club are held weekly and the membership is composed of men and women who are interested in the subject of dramatic art.

At a regular meeting of Cleveland Lodge, held on June 28, the election of officers was held and plans for the summer activities were discussed.

The Players' Club of the B'nai B'rith has secured the services of Dr. Daniel Huebsch to direct its literary activities for the coming season. At a meeting of the club held on July 26 "The Nigger", a play by Edward Sheridan, was read and discussed. At a previous meeting two other plays, "The Melting Pot", and "The Next Religion", both by Israel Zangwill. had been discussed. It is the plan of the club to continue the reading of plays of recognized work for the purely literary value.

The steady growth of the club has been encouraging. There are now more than fifty members enrolled, with practically a full attendance at each meeting.

On Sunday, July 29, the Players' Club held an outing at Chippewa Lake.

At a meeting of the Finance and House Committee of Cleveland Lodge No. 16, held on Aug. 5, 1917, plans were discussed for raising funds to build a gymnasium. A committee was appointed to look into the matter as to the cost of building a swimming pool and gymnasium at the rear of the building.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.

At a meeting of the joint committee of the B'nai B'rith Lodges of New Orleans, a committee was appointed to devise ways and means of establishing a course of lectures on Jewish subjects. This committee being of the opinion that an agency should be created which would regularly and systematically provide this form of education, recommended the establishment of a Jewish Lecture Bureau for New Orleans and has called upon the Jewish community to aid in this work. All Jewish organizations have been invited to send representatives at the meeting soon to be held to fully work out the plan.

ABRAHAM GEIGER LODGE, SPOKANE, WASH.

Before a large audience at the joint meeting of Abraham Geiger Lodge, No. 423, I. O. B. B., and the Ida Blum Strauss Auxiliary, Daughters of the Covenant, held Thursday evening, June 14, to welcome David N. Mosessohn, Grand President of District No. 4, I. O. B. B., Mr. Mosessohn delivered a most enthusiastic address, in which he explained the importance of the Order and urged everyone to be patriotic. He also made a strong appeal for assistance to the war sufferers. He said in part:

"A terrible crisis has come all over the world. We Jews have a double crisis to ace, especially in the war zone, where extinction is overtaking our people. Our synagog and our Order teach us to be patriotic. To get at the right sort of patriotism we must first have unity in action and organization. Then we must know the spirit of sacrifice. The breadth, the American spirit, the Jewish spirit of B'nai B'rith, represents the higher things of life. Materialism cannot enter into our lives at such times as these.

"In this terrible holocaust our people are begging for help. What have we done for them? God has destined us to live in a land of promise, to live under the glorious Stars and Stripes. We should help those who are in distress, who are suffering from the ruin of the war in Poland and Galacia.

"I hope in the end there will be everlasting peace over all the world. But first there must be peace in the community; we must get together in our efforts".

Mr. and Mrs. Mosessohn were honored with a banquet given in their honor, at which speeches were made by the guests of honor and by S. Stern and H. Rosenhaupt. At its conclusion "America" was sung by all. Afterwards dancing was enjoyed.

It was a real family re-union. Jewish men and women from all parts of eastern Arkansas and other states were there. For weeks elaborate preparations had been made by the committee of which Brother L, Barnett was chairman.

Rabbi Henry Raphael Gold of Memphis, was the principal speaker of the occasion. He addressed the audience on "The Meaning of B'nai B'rith". He said that whenever the Jew begins to forget his Judaism the B'nai B'rith brings him to the realization that he is still a Jew and crystallizes the various elements and forms a platform upon which he may stand and work for the welfare of humanity and his own people. In concluding his forceful address Rabbi Gold said that the B'nai B'rith does not pretend to be a substitute for the synagogue, but on the contrary, it is an adjunct thereto and teaches the Jew to be more of a Jew and to adhere more closely to his traditions.

Following Rabbi Gold's address, Brother Joe Samfield, Past President of Memphis Lodge, addressed the audience, emphasizing the great good the B'nai B'rith has accomplished and spoke of its prospects in the future.

Other speakers were Brothers Jacob Shaul of Marianna, Ark,, and L. Barnett of Forrest City.

On Sunday, June 17, 1917, Bro. H. D. Frankel of St. Paul, first vice-president of the District Grand Lodge, paid an official visit to Menorah Lodge of Stevens Point, Wis. The original program called for a lodge meeting at 10 in the morning, an open meeting in the afternoon, and a social evening, following with a grand ball, but inclement weather necessitated the postponement of the lodge meeting to the afternoon. This meeting was well attended, almost all of the members of the lodge being present, about one dozen visiting brethren from Wausau Lodge of Wausau, Wis., two visiting brethren from Ramah Lodge of Chicago and one from Saskatoon, Canada.

A class of nine candidates was initiated by the degree team of the lodge, with Brother Frankel acting as presiding officer.

DISTRICT NO. 1.

Though the lodges adjourned for the summer months, there was considerable activity in some of the lodges, also at the Headquarters of the District, 2307 Broadway. A number of ladies, members of the Auxiliary of the Home for the Aged at Yonkers, have been meeting regularly at the Headquarters to sew for the red cross, and a very large amount of work has been accomplished. Bro. Herman Asher, Chairman of the Building Committee, placed the reception rooms of the Headquarters at the disposal of these worthy women, who worked steadily for the cause all through the summer.

A new lodge was formed in Bangor, Maine, through the efforts of the District Secretary, Bro. Dr. Bernard M. Kaplan, who enlisted in the service of the Order the best citizens of the community. The temporary officers of the new lodge are: President, A. B. Friedman; vice-president, Dr. L. M. Pastor; secretary, M. L. Rosen; treasurer, H. H. Epstein. The installation of the lodge is expected to take place some time in October, when a number of distinguished officers and brothers of the District will be present. Mr. Meyer Minsky has been appointed chairman of a special committee to arrange for the reception of the brothers who will visit Bangor for the purpose of installing the new lodge.

THE GREAT WEALTH OF THE CZAR.

The ex-Czar of Russia is estimated to be the richest man in the world. If the Russian people do not confiscate his horded-up fabulous fortune, to which they are by right entitled, for he pressed it all out of their very life, and if he is not placed before a courtmartial to be tried for his treachery and sentenced to death or imprisonment for life, either of which punishments he fully deserves, he will no doubt withdraw with his family to his rich and wonderfully situated estate in Livadia, near Yalta in the Crimea, where he will spend the rest of his days in great luxury and ease among a profusion of the most exquisite exotic flowers and the richest vineyards in the world. The Czarina has a separate villa there in the pleasure grounds of the vast imperial park, which was built by Count Potocki, and which distinguishes itself by its great beauty and comfortable arrangements. Near by is also a magnificent villa belonging to the heir to the Russian throne, which is of more ornamental architecture.

The wealth of Nicholas Romanoff is estimated to exceed 2,000,000,000 (two billion) rouble, a fortune which no man ever had under his individual control.

The Czar was the greatest land owner in the world. Before the present world war the Russian empire occupied an area of 8,647,657 square miles, a seventh part of the entire globe. Land for cultivation there is in Russia 984,083,763 acres, and the Czar owned 70 per cent of all the land.

As head of the church he owned all of the church property, amounting to billions. Upon this land are the most magnificent timber, the most colossal mines and agricultural lands enough to furnish food for a nation of people. The state paid him a salary of ten million dollars a year, and if he wanted more all he would have had to do would have been to sign an order demanding it, since he was the state himself.

The remaining 30 per cent are divided as follows: 181,606,519 acres belong to the nobility, 36,321,303 to business people, 35,141,886 to the farming class, 8,381,839 to various land owners, and 5,673,289 to others classes.

As the number of nobles is 1,400,000 and the number of farmers is more than 110,000,000, it means that each farmer owned no more than one-third of an acre. In other words, of each 384 loaves of bread which were produced in Russia, 383 went to the nobility and only one loaf to the farmers, and when it is taken into consideration that the nobility pays no taxes at all and the farmers must pay taxes on everthing they possess, it can be imagined under what conditions the Russian farmer had to live.

All of the mines of Siberia were owned by the Czar personally. He received a royalty upon every ounce of mineral that is mined there. Therefore every man he sent to Siberia, condemned to work in the mines like a beast of burden and without pay, increased the Czar's income. His total personal annual income was not less than 90,000,000 rouble, which means that he took in 170 rouble every minute of the day of 24 hours. Much of his wealth is deposited in the Bank of England, and in the greatest banks of Paris, Berlin and New York. It is also invested in the great American enterprises. He owns, for instance, many thousands of shares of stock of the Pennsylvania Railroad.

Besides his great personal income, the Czarina received annually 200,000 rouble from the state treasury, each child of the Czar received 40,000 rouble per annum, the heir to the throne 100,000 rouble a year, and each daughter 2,000,000 rouble as dowry when she gets married.

If we contrast the appalling Jewish poverty in Russia with the astounding affluence of the Czar and the immense wealth of the Russian nobility, we can also form an idea under what appalling conditions the oppressed Jews had to exist in the Pale.

Some of our Jewish papers published some time ago the following report from Wilna, the main city of Lithuania, in western Russia:

"The Wilna community has dispatched a memorandum to the Upper and Lower Houses of Parliament, advocating the abolition of the Pale. In reviewing the situation created by the anti-Jewish restrictions from both moral and economic aspects, the communual leaders produce striking statistics which speak volumes for the conditions in the Pale. In the Wilna province there are over 200,000 Jews, of whom 90 per cent live in the towns and townlets (this constitutes an increase of seven per cent during the continued exiles from the villages), who are employed in trade, commercial institutions or other branches of industry. Twenty per cent of these are earning between $120 and $150 per annum. The rest are merchants and shop-keepers, or people of no fixed occupation, seldom possessing more than $500 and invariably earning not more than four per cent interest on their capital. A vast number of those so-called merchants only possess a capital of a little over $50. As a result of these conditions, families consisting of ten persons very often live in one small room, and the illness or unemployment of the bread-winner is accompanied by the starvation of the whole family. Epidemics and mortality also show a steady increase.

"In the present circumstances, the commonwealth leaders argue, three remedies against the evil suggest themselves to the Jews, namely, charity, education and immigration. The official Jewish societies of Wilna alone spend $50,000 per annum on charities. Education, as a means of obtaining privileges, is now effectively barred internally and externally, and immigration from Russia can only lead to the departure of the strong and healthy leaving behind the weak and ailing. To avoid disaster, it is therefore necessary to abolish the Pale and allow the Jews to leave the congested towns".

This memorandum found no favor in the eyes of the Russian officials. The horrible miseries of the Jews of Wilna were not only not mitigated, but were caused to grow worse from day to day. The same crushing poverty existed all through the Pale. It sapped the life of the Russian Jews; it decimated their numbers and bowed them all down in the dust. The Russian government was pityless; it kept its heel upon the necks of the fallen Jew and ground his body and soul deeper and deeper into the mire of misery.

Thank God, all these sufferings, all these tears and all these tribulations of the Jews in Russia have now come to an end!

JEWISH RELIEF FUND.

A campaign has been launched in this city with a view to raising a thousand dollars for the Jewish Relief Fund, which will go to care for the four and a half million destitute Jewish war victims. For the first time in their history the Jewish leaders are appealing to all, Jew and Gentile alike, to lend aid in this cause, and it is nothing but right that the Gentiles should be asked and expected to do something toward a work of this kind.

To the Jews we are indebted for a large part of the charitable work which has alleviated suffering in our own cities in times of peace and which now holds out the hand to the sufferers of Europe. The Jew, of all races involved, is least responsible for this world struggle which has placed such a heavy toll on his people. Long accustomed to be generous in giving, the Jew now finds himself in the predicament where the ravages of a war which is not his have strained his giving power and have compelled him to turn to the Gentile for aid.

In the city of Warsaw alone 45,000 little Jewish children are at the point of starvation. Thousands of Jewish men and women who were formerly prosperous are now face to face with the grim danger of actual starvation. And yet these people had no part in the great struggle. They are the innocent victims of the fray.

At the same time it should not be overlooked that in the armies of the Allies thousands of splendid soldiers are proud to claim their Jewish blood and eager to do their part toward advancing the cause of freedom. In Russia the Jew has fought without cessation the great fight for liberty. He has been ground down, oppressed, spat upon. He is now being starved.

We are all so constantly being appealed to in one way or another that it is hard to respond to every call for money. Nevertheless, in a world, pain-racked and starving, we cannot think as heretofore, we cannot allow ourselves to turn a deaf ear. We must, of course, discriminate. This Jewish relief work is of such a character as to stand up under the strongest scrutiny.

The world is outgrowing prejudice and for bigotry it finds but scant room. It is learning anew the meaning of suffering and want—and death. That is part of what we are being taught by this war. But, above all, we are learning that in such times as these we must give and give and still give—for, to even the hardest of us, a million starving children have strange powers to stir our sympathies, and quicken our generosity.

What will you do for a million starving Jewish children?—Sheridan Enterprise, Sheridan, Wyo.

If thou hast wandrings in the wilderness
And findest not Sinai, 'tis thy soul is poor."

Sketches of Modern Jewish History

By Gotthard Deutsch

II. THE DAWN OF A NEW ERA

It may not be superfluous to state by the way of an introduction what the task of a historian is. He must first collect the material, then examine it critically, afterwards arrange it to show the proper connection of the events, and lastly interpret it. Inasmuch as this system will appear from the presentation of our subject, it is not necessary to illustrate it by examples.

History, for the sake of clearness in its presentation, has to be subdivided according to time and place. Modern Jewish history shows two leading features. We see the Jewish people enter into the life of their environment, both politically and spiritually. Modern Jewish history, therefore, deals with the process of emancipation, showing the gradual removal of the disabilities from which the Jews had been suffering for centuries, and their secularization, showing how they emerge from their spiritual isolation.

No historic process is accomplished by the lightning flash method. It evolves gradually. Yet for the sake of convenience, we place some prominent facts like guide posts before our readers. In modern Jewish history the two facts which clearly indicate the beginning of a new era are, the emancipation of the Jews by the law, passed by the national assembly of France, Sept. 27, 1791, and the publication of Mendelssohn's German translation of the Pentateuch, 1783.

We shall begin with the political side of the problem, believing that it is antecedent to the spiritual emancipation, although sometimes this question is like the old problem, whether the egg or the hen was first. It was said before that no historic process is understood without tracing its gradual development. If we, therefore, wish to understand the new era which began when the French Parliament took the radical step of placing the Jews on the same level with their fellow citizens, we have to go back to the era of the Protestant Reformation. For whatever may be said about the national characteristics of the Jews, it cannot be denied that the individual Jew, when he embraced the Christian faith, was at once emancipated.

The Protestant Reformation, no matter how narrow some of its leaders were, stood in principle for the freedom of individual conscience. Graetz, in discussing the effect of the Reformation on the condition of the Jews, makes the rather flippant remark, that it resulted in some benefit for the Jews, because the various parties in Christendom, having their hands full with their internal quarrels, had not time to think so much of the Jews as had the united mediaeval church. One individual fact will refute this statement. A pastor in Hesse, Georg Nigrinus, published in 1570 a book whose title, "Juedenfeind", is in itself a clear presentation of its contents. The Landgravedom of Hesse was then divided between various members of the dynasty. Pastor Nigrinus was a subject of Landgrave Ludwig. The latter's brother, Landgrave William, was very much displeased with the ideas presented in the antisemitic book. He expresses his indignation in a letter to his brother Ludwig, and says: "The arguments which your pastor uses would be the best weapon in the hands of the papists, who declare that only the papist religion has a right to demand toleration in Catholic states". We see, therefore, clearly that the principle of the Protestant Reformation, while denied by some of its leading expounders in regard to some extremists like the Anabaptists, after all resulted in the conviction that religious minorities had a legal claim on toleration.

It is exceedingly difficult to trace the effect of new ideas upon the political development of a state. The channels through which they penetrate into the public are often invisible, but the effects can always be seen. Such an effect of the new gospel, which claimed toleration for religious minorities, can be seen in a memoir, which Josel of Rosheim addressed to the city council of Colmar, Alsace, when in 1548 an order was issued prohibiting the entrance into the city to all Jews. Josel says: "Though we do not profess the same religion, we are all human beings, whom the Almighty has created, and has therefore bestowed on them the right to live next to other human beings on His earth".

The method announced in the introductory remarks, that history has to be understood in the proper sequence of events, will find an illustration in this case. In 1394 the Jews were expelled from France. The law of migration always shows that people do not leave their habitation unless forced to by either political or economic conditions, and that, when compelled to leave, they, or at least the majority of them, do not go any farther than they have to. The French Jews settled mostly right beyond the French border in the German territory of Alsace. Alsace was typically German, not only in the character and language of its population, but also in its constitution. The various feudal lords were almost independent in their territories, and their autonomy included the full control over their Jewish subjects. Alsace therefore presented that advantageous condition which a rabbi in the Talmud already calls a godsend for the Jews, who being persecuted in or expelled from one territory, always had an opportunity of finding protection in another place. This advantage naturally had also its disadvantages. Being delivered up to the whim of petty tyrants in small districts, the Jews lacked the possibility of cooperation. They obviated this difficulty to some extent by organizing a committee, representing the various Jewish settlements living in the different territories of the section. Colmar was an "imperial free city," and as such, autonomous. It did not tolerate Jews as residents, but under the existing federal constitution it could not debar them from entering the city on business, as long as they were provided with a proper passport. Occasionally, however, they made use of their sovereign rights to such an extent that they would refuse the Jews even admission to the city on business. To defend themselves against such an injustice, the Jews of the various small territories banded together and appointed one of their number as solicitor. They called him officially "Shtadlan", which, literally translated, means "endeavorer", showing the conception of his task. It was his business to endeavor by means of persuasion, by bribes, and wire pulling, to obtain a better consideration of the rights of the Jews. Quite recently some Yiddish journalist called Mr. Simon Wolf rather boldly a modern "Shtadlan". Josel Rosheim, named so from the place of his residence, was the most successful and the best known Shtadlan of his time. Graetz is in error when he calls him an imperial officer, who had charge of the Jewish affairs of the German Empire. He was not appointed by the Emperor, but elected by the Jews of Alsace, though owing to the wide acquaintance which he possessed, he was often asked to use his influence on behalf of his coreligionists in other sections of Germany. The most interesting proof of this situation is the fact that at one time he was heavily fined for translating his Hebrew title into the German "der gemeynen Jeudischheyt Regierer", which was declared to involve a lese majesty, because only the Kaiser was the ruler of German Jewry. Indeed such a ruler of the Jews could never claim anything as a right. He had to be satisfied, when his humble supplication made any impression on monarchs, prelates and officials. Yet just because of this fact, it is highly significant that Josel had the courage to remind the city council of Colmar that a Jew also was a human being, and possessed the inalienable rights, based on this fact. We understand the boldness of this statement when we consider the fact that Frederick the Great, in spite of being a free thinker, once wrote: "If we would expel the Jews from the Polish provinces we would have fewer Jews and more human beings". In the light of this statement again, we must attribute a considerable importance to a phrase found in the petition of the Jews, presented to the Reichstag of Augsburg in 1550, in which they say: "All of us are equally the creatures of God Almighty". Such an assertion of human rights cannot be understood without an appreciation of its religious basis. This again we find strongly presented in a remarkable, though not very popular, book. Jean Bodin (1530-1596), a French statesman, wrote a Latin book, whose long and awkward title I prefer to give in an approximate English translation. It is called "Seven Days, or a Treatise on the Mysteries of Sublime Ideas". In this book the author gives a dialogue between people professing various religions, and the representative of Judaism seems to be given the best of the arguments. At all events, in this and in another book which deals with constitutional law, Bodin severely condemns religious persecution.

In order to understand the currents of thought at this period, we have to emancipate ourselves from the widespread prejudice that the religious controversies of the era of Reformation were merely quibbles about theological subtleties. Here, again, the necessity of interpreting history impresses itself upon the student. These apparent subtleties are expressions of principles, which range from rigid conservatism to free thought, the latter presented in an anonymous book called "The Three Impostors", which was probably written in the latter part of the sixteenth century, and condemns all strictly dogmatic religions. The same attitude is presented more temperately in the philosophy of Sir John Locke (1632-1704), whose "Essays Concerning Human Understanding", and whose "Letters Concerning Toleration" deserve a prominent place in Jewish history. Sir John Locke was a young man, when religious controversies, both in Great Britain and on the continent of Europe, brought the terrible scourge of endless wars upon humanity. Such an era naturally demanded a solution of the political problem. Locke finds the solution in the duty of the state to tolerate all religions. He says literally: "If we may openly speak the truth, and as becomes one man to another, neither pagan nor Mahometan, nor Jew, ought to be excluded from the civil rights of the commonwealth because of his religion". He applied this doctrine practically in drafting the constitution of South Carolina, which contained a clause declaring the rights of the colonists independent of religious belief, and mentioning the Jews in the category of those who should possess equal rights. This fact explains to us the prosperous Jewish settlement of Charleston, S. C., which up to the beginning of the nineteenth century was the largest Jewish congregation in the United States.

A number of apparently trivial facts, as also of facts of apparently local significance, will show to us the growing spirit of toleration. The law department of the University of Altdorf, near Nuremberg, long extinct, was in 1696 asked to decide the question, whether Christians may do for Jews work on Sabbath, which the Jews consider prohibited. The significance of this question will appear from the fact that Pope Gregory XVI (1830-1846) still once issued an order demanding that this Christian law which prohibited such assistance, as a confirmation of the Jews in their bigotry, be enforced. The learned jurists of the University of Altdorf naturally cite a long line of authorities, pro and con, but they declare in the end that universal humanitarian principles, based on the laws of God and nature, give an affirmative answer to the question. At the same time we see Jews readmitted into a number of places, from which they had been excluded for centuries. The historian must insist again that such facts be considered, not in their isolation as individual incidents, but in their interpretation as expressions of a principle. The most important instance of this spirit of toleration is the admission of the Jews into the new republic of the Netherlands. These provinces of Spain had fought for their independence on the ground of religious toleration, and their noble ruler, William the Silent (1533-1584) had expressly declared that the state which had gained its independence on the basis of a fight for religious freedom would grant religious freedom to all, Jews and Christians, including even the Roman Catholics, whose intolerance had flooded the land with blood. Similarly we see the Jews slowly admitted into places like Hamburg and Bordeaux. In both places they appear not as Jews, but as Portuguese merchants. Speaking a language different from their environment, they found it easier to be overlooked in a cosmopolitan seaport. In Bordeaux they received royal patents as early as 1550, but for nearly two centuries they still had to pretend that they were Christians, though it was generally known that they were not. In Hamburg, the question was solved sooner. The "Portuguese merchants", who settled there in the early years of the seventeenth century, were soon recognized as Jews, and allowed to practice their religion, though under considerable restrictions, and not obtaining their recognition as a corporation until 1710. A small but typical instance is the case of Ratisbon. This imperial city had expelled her Jews in 1519. This fact presents the tail end of the period of expulsions, which were most serious in the fifteenth century. Inasmuch as Ratisbon was often the seat of the Reichstag, Jews had occasion to come there on official business. The "Erbmarschall", one of the highest officers of the Empire, had the duty to look after them, and to see that they should not overstep the limits of their rights. In 1663 Ratisbon became the permanent seat of the Reichstag, and from this time on the Erbmarschall had the right of keeping three to four Jews in the city permanently to attend to his personal business. As this was a source of a little graft, His Excellency naturally saw to it that his quota was at least full, and in many instances we hear of complaints that he overstepped the legal limit.

A similar instance was the case of Rendsburg, in the Duchy of Schleswig-Holstein. The Duke who, having to fight the competition of the neighboring seaport of Hamburg, wished to bring business into his state, and therefore allowed in 1690 the Jews to settle in Rendsburg. Having gone so far, he allowed them in 1694 to build a synagogue, under the condition that the building should not have a valuted ceiling. An analogy to this principle is the case of Vienna, whose oldest synagogue, opened in 1826, does not have the appearance of a place of worship, but looks like the adjoining apartment houses. This was the condition under which Emperor Francis I allowed the building of a synagogue in his capital.

When we spoke of the oldest synagogue, it was not meant that this was the oldest synagogue ever built in Vienna, but the oldest synagogue in existence. There is another old synagogue, which was turned into a church when the Jews were expelled in 1670. This expulsion is again a matter of more than local import. It is the last expulsion of Jews on a large scale, and leads at once into modern history. Fifty families of those expelled from Vienna appealed to the Elector of Brandenburg to allow them settlement in his states. Such petitions are naturally frequent, but it is of historic significance that the perition of the Vienna exiles is based on a claim of religious toleration. They had heard that the elector had opened his states to the Huguenots expelled from France, and they asked as human beings, persecuted for the sake of their religion, that he grant them the same privileges. Their request was granted, and the elector showed by this fact his broadmindedness, although the new settlers were still placed under considerable restrictions, including the prohibition of a place of worship. Four years previously the elector had banished from Berlin a popular preacher. Paul Gerhardt, a truly noble soul, and a poet of great gifts, whose translation of Psalm 37—

> "Vertraue Deine Wege
> Und was dein Herze kraenkt
> Der aller treuesten Pflege
> Des der den Himmel lenkt
> Der Wolken Luft und Winden
> Gibt Wege, Pfad und Bahn
> Er wird den Weg auch finden
> Da dein Fuss wandeln kann".

is a gem of German literature, was a narrow Lutheran fanatic. He preached against the toleration of the Calvinists. The elector as a statesman, who had enough to keep down the controversies between Catholics and Protestants, did not wish any troubles between the Protestant churches. He therefore demanded that Gerhardt stop his polemical preaching. The pastor refused and was expelled. His congregation, who admired him greatly, petitioned the elector to repeal his order, claiming that inasmuch as the Catholics ,and even the Jews, "who blaspheme the Lord every day in their prayers", are tolerated, the polemics of a Lutheran minister should be allowed. The elector remained firm and the Jews were from now on permanently permitted to remain in Berlin, the capital of Brandenburg, shortly afterwards enlarged to the Kingdom of Prussia.

The philosophy of religious toleration ound soon afterwards a most eloquent xpounder in Jean Jacques Rousseau 1712-1778). His "Emile", which was ublished for the first time in 1762, beame one of the most powerful factors in haping the ideas which found their legal xpression in the French Revolution. The hilosophy of Rousseau, briefly stated, aims that all distinctions between huan beings, based on historic rights, are rong, and that the state must consider an as a natural being, who as such is qual to everybody else. In this book ousseau refers briefly to the Jews. "Do ou know", he exclaims, "many Chrisans who have taken pains to examine eriously the position of Judaism? If hey ever saw anything on this subject, hey saw it in the books of Christians. his is a convenient way of obtaining formation on the arguments of one's pponents. But how could you do otherise? If one were to publish here books ating the Jewish view, we would pun-h the author, the publisher and the ookseller. Surely this is a very con-nient method to prove that you are ght.

"Those among us who have gone so far to discuss religious questions with ews have not done any better. The poor retches are entirely at our discretion. ur tyranny makes them timid. They now well that Christian charity in their ase means injustice and cruelty. They ould not dare to speak freely, knowing at we would call their arguments blas-emy. Our greed adds to our religious al, and they are too rich not to be in e wrong. The wisest and broadest peo- are always the most circumspect. u may convert some poor devil, whom u pay for blackguarding his former religion. But do you believe that in places where they would feed themselves secure you could refute them so easily? At the Sorbonne it is clear as daylight that the Messianic predictions referred to Jesus. For the rabbis of Amsterdam it is just as clear that these passages have an entirely different meaning. I can never believe that we know the Jewish side of religious questions if the Jews have not a country of their own, with schools and universities, where they can talk freely without any danger".

Rousseau was a great power in shaping the mind of the eighteenth century. But he was not the only one to prepare the way for a better understanding of the Jews. As one of the literary men who carried the beacon light of religious toleration for humanity we must consider Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729-1781). In one of his earliest works, in the play, "The Jews", which he wrote in 1749, as a young man of twenty, the son of a Saxon pastor, whose country excluded the Jews from residence, pleads the gospel of toleration. He gives us a Jew who is a noble character, and in compensation for an unselfish service, which he renders to a woman, he merely demands that his people should be judged individually. A similar position was taken two years previously by the German poet Gellert (1715-1769), who in a novel entitled "The Life of a Swedish Countess", presents a Polish Jew who assists a Swedish count, made a prisoner in Siberia. The Countess, who is the heroine of the story, says: "I am sure that many members of this people would be better if we would not make them mean by our conduct". The real gospel of toleration, however, was presented by Lessing in his brilliant drama, "Nathan the Wise" (1778). Its lesson is clearly expressed in the story of the three rings, which Lessing borrowed with some alterations from the novels of Boccacio, in the fourteenth century. We might sum up the purpose of the poet in the statement that all countries have good people, and that the same bark will not fit all trees. The drama is not an apology for Judaism, although it has been repeatedly claimed that Nathan was a portrait of Moses Mendelssohn. Nathan's religion is the religion of good deeds, not of creed or of a distinct ritual. The poet wished to impress his audience with the lesson that Christianity has not a monopoly on ethics, and therefore he selected a Jew as the best representative of the religion of humanity. It was natural that the representatives of privileged religions, and those who harbored prejudice against the Jews condemned the drama as blasphemy. The city council of Frankfort am Main prohibited its production because of its "scandalous contents" (1779), and as late as 1815 the Archbishop of Vienna, Count Hohenwart, also advised to prohibit the production of a play which taught Rousseau's idea of natural religion.

Lessing was not the only one who preached this idea of the religion of good deeds in its application to the improvement of the condition of the Jews. The city of Vienna, which almost thirty years after the publication of "Nathan the Wise" prohibited its production, allowed in the days of Joseph II a play to be produced which taught the same lesson. Joseph von Pauersbach, who lived in Vienna from 1772 to 1783, wrote a play entitled "The Honest Farmer and the Generous Jew". The play has long been forgotten and is of no literary merit. Its historic importance, however, is not to be overlooked. A plain farmer's wife teaches her boy not to believe what the school teacher says about the Jews, nor to annoy them, because the Jews are our fellowmen. We must not judge the influence of any literary work exclusively by its literary merits. It is fairly certain that 150 years hence the "Auctioneer" will be as completely forgotten as von Pauersbach's "Honest Farmer". This does not in the least alter the fact that in our days the "Auctioneer", as well as "Potash and Perlmutter" drew large houses and had considerable effect on molding public opinion with regard to the Jews.

More important than the long forgotten comedy of the Vienna playwright is Richard Cumberland's "The Jew", first produced in 1794. It had in its day a wonderful success, was translated into German and produced before full houses by Iffland, in his day probably the leading actor of the German stage, and it is still occasionally seen on the English stage. Its literary merit is of a rather low order. Yet it taught the lesson of "Nathan the Wise" that you find amongst the Jews noble characters. While the play is younger than those mentioned before, it belongs to the factors that helped to mold public opinion, because it was intended by its author as an atonement for a hostile play, "The Fashionable Lover", produced in 1772, in which the Jew played a very objectionable role.

The change of attitude with regard to the Jews naturally showed itself in their legal treatment. Frederick the Great, no lover of the Jews, as he clearly states, and calling them occasionally bad names, had in spite of his prejudices recognized the value of the Jews for the economic development of the country. In individual instances he placed Jews who engaged in the manufacture of textile goods on a basis almost equal to that of Christians. Among the most prominent advisers we find men who boldly advocated the placing of the Jews on an equal footing with Christians. Counsellor Manitius, whose position was equal to that of an assistant secretary of the treasury in our days, declares as early as 1745 that the prejudice against the Jews was bigotry, or as he expresses it in the stilted German of his days, "das ex papatu originierende Odium religiosum", which could not be maintained by the enlightened people of our days. Twenty years later another official, d'Asnieres, opposed the project of increasing the special Jew taxes on the ground that any discrimination against the Jews is unjust, that there is really no difference between the business conducted by Jews and Christians, and that, whatever there may be found, is due to the injustice in the treatment of the Jews, which ought to be removed in the interest of the state.

Small matters often illustrate historic tendencies best. The city of Salzburg was the capital of a principality, over which the archbishop ruled as secular lord. It therefore was governed by narrow ecclesiasticism. The Jews had been expelled from this territory in 1498, and in the eighteenth century the Protestants were expelled, a fact which is underlying Goethe's epic, "Hermann und Dorothea", and Karl Schoenherr's remarkable drama, "Glaube und Heimat". One of the symbols of intolerance in this episcopal capital, found also in other cities, was a "Judensau", a sow at whose udders Jews were sucking. This was one of the rudest expressions of anti-Jewish prejudice. The archbishop, while not admitting Jews to his capital, gave order to remove the objectionable picture. Far more important, however, are the legal changes which we meet at that time in Austria.

DR. JOSEPH KRAUSKOPF ON ZIONISM.

(Extract from his Annual Message as President of the National Farm School, Sunday Oct. 7, 1917.)

"It seems written in the stars that, when the war will be over, and lands will be given back to the people from whom they were stolen, and these people will be permitted to govern themselves in accordance with their own desires, the expatriated Jew will obtain the long-prayed for privilege of returning to his onetime fatherland, there to be at rest at last. Upon this, the great powers of the earth, the United States, England, France, Germany, Italy, Russia, the Catholic Church, seem to be agreed. And many millions of Jews will avail themselves of that privilege, for they know that, even though war will come to an end, prejudice will not cease. They know that the heroic and self-sacrificing service which the Jew has rendered to every nation under whose flag he has battled and died, will be forgotten. Peace will re-enter the lands but anti-Semitism will be on the rampage as before. Many millions of Jews, especially in East-European lands, are tired of being regarded aliens in the lands of their birth, in being denied citizenship rights in some, in being subjected to humility, to restrictions and ostracisms and persecutions in others, notwithstanding their discharging their full citizenship duties, notwithstanding their contributing more than their quota to their country's army and navy, their performing on the battlefields ,in defense of their country, deeds of heroism unexcelled by any other people, their promoting their country's highest good in the halls of learning, in the fields of industry, in the marts of trade. They see no other escape from the prejudices and ill-will of the people among whom they live than a return to the land of their fathers, there to resume, as many thousands of them already do, their agricultural pursuit of old, that made the Holy Land a land to overflow with milk and honey, a land that produced not only great harvests of grain and fruit, of herds and flock, but also of great men, of prophets, lawgivers, inspired writers and thinkers, to whom the whole civilized world does homage, prophets, the like of whom are sorely needed today, prophets to make real at last the ancient dream of a Messianic age, an age that will see the peoples of the earth federated into a common brotherhood, under the common fatherhood of God, each engaged in furthering the common good of all.

"And so there, too, there will be work for us to do. From this school will go forth young men trained to lead brethren of theirs for the re-conquest of the Holy Land, not by means of sword or rifle, of gun or bomb, but by plough and scythe, by reaper and pruning hook.

"And when the call will come, we shall have the men ready to respond".

AEROPLANE IN JERUSALEM.

During the last few months the aeroplane has made its appearance in many strange places, not the least among these being the ancient city of Jerusalem. It was during his flight from Constantinople to Cairo that M. Bonnier, the French airman, passed over the Holy City in his monoplane, descending on the historic plain of Ephraim, a short distance south of Jerusalem. It was on this plain that King David met and defeated the Philistines. Never, in modern times, was the city so excited. It poured out en masse to see the airman and his machine—Christians, Jews and Moslems.

BUY LIBERTY BONDS

THE JEW AS A SOLDIER.

It is a foregone conclusion that the Jews as law-abiding citizens furnished their proportionate quota on Registration Day; neither does it suffer the slightest doubt that as good patriots, and, in gratitude for having found here a place of safety against the hatred of their brutal enemies, the native and foreign Jews were no slackers in subscribing for the Liberty Loan. But how many of them will appear in khaki, how will they behave in the trenches, how many will return with the war medal pinned to their breasts?

There is yet insufficient authentic material on the part played by the Jews in the present war, but the records of the past are known.

The Old Testament is fortunately still a very accessible and pretty well-known book. Therefore, why waste space and time in proving that the old Hebrews under Joshua, their judges and kings were valorous warriors before the Lord? And who does not know the story of the Maccabees and the desperate defense of Jerusalem against the powerful legions of Vespasian and Titus in the year 70 A. D.? Who is not acquainted with the heroic stand of Bar Kohba, the Hebrew Garibaldi, and his followers at Bethar 135 A. D.? But probably very few readers will know that the Jews were not only brave soldiers in their own country, but that the martial fever drove thousands of them to serve as volunteers in the armies of Alexander the Great (365-323 B. C.) and of the Syrian kings; that Ptolemy I. of Egypt (323-309 B. C.) employed them with preference as garrison troops in his fortified places, thus recognizing, at the same time, the bravery and loyalty.

Ptolemy Philometer (died 145 B. C.), and his Queen Cleopatra committed their whole kingdom to the two Jewish generals Onias and Dositheus, for they were the only ones in the whole army on whom they could implicitly rely. Two other Hebrew generals, Hilkias and Ananias, saved the same Queen's throne from the onslaughts of her own son, Ptolemy Lathyrus.

Even Julius Caesar was obliged to speak in terms of high praise of the valor displayed by the 1500 Jewish soldiers in his wars against Egypt and Mithridates of Pergaman. Herod helped Mark Anthony with five Jewish cohorts.

But who, unless he made a special study of the subject, would dream of looking for sturdy Jewish warriors in the Arabia of Mahomet. It is, nevertheless, a fact that when the prophet came to Medina he found the whole country full of Jews ready to resist him, arms in hand. He tried to make of them his allies, but they refused.

Under King Alfonso VI. of Castile, in 1068, more than 40,000 Jews fought against Yusuf ibn Teshufin at the battle of Zalaka.

The famous traveler, Benjamin, of Tudela (twelfth century), tells of the existence of an independent Jewish warrior tribe living in the highlands of the Persian province of Khorasan, numbering many thousand families and living under a Jewish prince of the name of Joseph Amarkala.

In the Thirty Years' War the Jews defended the city of Prague against the Swedes (1648).

About one hundred years later (1742-1743), Rabbi Jonathan Eibenschuetz, a famous Talmudical scholar, together with other rabbis of the Bohemian capital, stood on the walls, encouraging their coreligionists to defend the city against the attacks of the French army.

When, in 1794, the population of Warsaw rose in arms, a whole Jewish regiment, under its own colonel, of the name of Berko, was fighting in the suburb of Praga against the Russian General Suwarow.

Jewish sailors in the Dutch navy excelled in courage in the conquest of Brazil.

And now, to come to this country: there was only a handful of Jews in the time of the Revolutionary War. But the names of forty-six Jewish soldiers are known. Colonel Isaac Franks and Colonel David Salisbury Franks occupied places of honor in the military history of our country.

Brigadier General Joseph Bloomfield and eight other Jewish officers distinguished themselves in the War of 1812.

The American navy carries on its roll of honor the names of Commodore Uriah Phillips Levy, Captain Levi Myers and Commander Adolf Marix.

Throughout the Civil War Jewish patriotism and gallantry shone out most brilliantly: 7878 Jews out of a total population of 150,000 were found on either of the two sides.

Union of American Hebrew Congregations

Something Better Than Charity

Charity is an elementary Jewish characteristic. From early times the rabbis have made charity synonymous with justice. For both they used the term "Zedakah", because the two were one and the same thing. "Zedakah" was a religious command. In late years Jewish charity has become secularized. Our charitable bequests have taken the form of aid to hospitals, orphan asylums, helping the poor and the needy, the aged and the crippled. This is laudable work. All praise should be bestowed upon the heart that prompts and the hand that gives in this way. It aims to reduce the amount of social waste. Jewish charity attempts to reduce the amount of Jewish waste, the sick, the poor, the maimed. It means much to heal the sick, but it means more to cleanse the source of sickness. It is fine to provide artificial limbs for the maimed but it is better to have laws passed to put guards on exposed machinery. This, too, is the task of the new philanthropy. The great bulk of Jewish charity in this country attempts to make abnormal conditions approach the normal stage. The great movement in charitable endeavor today is preventive rather than palliative. It seeks to eliminate the causes of dependence rather than to remove the symptoms of distress. There is still another form of Jewish charity which is more constructive than the above mentioned. It is preventive in its implication. It is far-sighted and constructive in its vision. It's based on the principle which has become axiomatic in Jewish life, namely: THAT THE BIRTHRIGHT OF EVERY JEWISH CHILD IS A JEWISH EDUCATION. There is something better than charity and that is justice. It reckons with the hundreds of thousands of Jewish children in America who are growing up without adequate religious education or moral training. The great army to be found in the city wilderness as well as the country hamlet is thereby becoming Jewish "waste" in a more potent sense than are the maimed, the crippled, the blind, the sick and the aged. A Jewish boy or girl who is reared in ignorance of the tenets and teachings of our Torah, indifferent to Jewish hopes and insensible to a realization of Jewish responsibility, is not only potential Jewish "waste" but a potential menace to the conservation and the perpetuation of the Jewish religion. Nay, more, he simultaneously becomes a social menace to the group in which he lives. Too long have we neglected the normal phases of Jewish life which constitutes 95 per cent of our problems. We have failed to emphasize the great need for constructively planning that our Jewish children should be raised in the fold of the Jewish religion. We have given thousands to charity, to help the physically abnormal, because of the strong emotional and sentimental appeal which this phase of charity makes upon us. It is time now to sound an alarm, that the present generation of young men and women is growing up without strong attachment for their religion and their people. And this for no other reason, than because of our negligence to provide them with a vitalized Jewish religious training. If what the past generations have handed down to us fails to be transmitted to future generations, we will have only ourselves to blame. What we need today are more Jewish religious schools, more men and women devoted with an unquenchable zeal to the cause of Jewish education, and large funds to carry out the plans thus far formulated. A constructive move in this direction was made in the year 1912 by Mr. Joseph Schonthal of Columbus, Ohio. For many years he had realized the truths herein above stated, and when he wished to pay tribute to the memory of his beloved wife, Hermine Schonthal, of blessed memory, he presented a fund to the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (now known as the Hermine Schonthal Publication Fund) the income of which was to be used for the publication of textbooks for Jewish religious schools. The fund was to be self-perpetuating, so that the process of producing Jewish religious school textbooks might never cease in American Israel. With the help of this fund the Department of Synagog and School Extension published a series of Bible Story texts covering the period from Saul to the Exile for both pupils and teachers, and in the last five years the total distribution of the books published under the Hermine Schonthal Publication Fund has amounted to some 12,000. This is about 10 per cent of the total number of Jewish text books distributed by the Department of Synagog and School Extension. Realizing the permanent value, and constructive character of the gift he originally made to the cause of rearing a generation of God-fearing young Jews and Jewesses, Mr. Joseph Schonthal recently donated an additional $1,000 which was to be embodied in the Hermine Schonthal Publication Fund. Such charity not only forms a noble way of perpetuating the memory of one dear and near to us, but is characterized by a potency, constructiveness and vision to which no other form of Jewish charity is at all comparable. This kind of charity needs not merely to be emulated, but imitated. Mr. Schonthal has set the example. Let others follow.

Appeal for War Sufferers Abroad

Rev. Dr. N. Friedlander, Rabbi of the Ninth Street Temple, Brooklyn, New York, devoted his Yom Kipper sermon to an appeal for starving co-religionists in Russia, Poland and Palestine.

Dr. Friedlander spoke as follows:

"What is there so touching as a sad tear glistening in the weeping eye or rolling down the wrinkled cheek? What oratory awakens such pathos as the eloquence which flows from one single teardrop? There is not a sadder tale told, a greater sorrow expressed, or a more earnest prayer uttered, than the shedding of a tear.

"A tear? Who can define it, who can tell its ingredients, who can trace its source? The chemist tells us it is composed of salt and lime. The poet names it 'The test of affection'. The philosopher calls it 'The language of grief'. But, after all, to know the meaning of a tear, we must ask, not the chemist, not the poet, nor the philosopher, but the one who felt its bitterness, its fervor, its depth of emotion.

"You want to know the fervor of a tear, sit beside your mother in the house of prayer on Atonement Eve; if your mother is in another town, another land, or in another world, bring to your memory your happy childhood, when you sat by her side at this hour. Do you notice, or do you remember, how she alternately turned towards you, raised her eyes heavenward, and shed a tear? It was a tear of love, a tear of prayer, a tear of pleading to Heaven for her child.

"You want to know what a tear is, behold that farewell scene, the scene of our young men's parting for the field of battle in defense of America's right. Relatives, friends and acquaintances shout 'God speed', and wave their handkerchiefs 'good-bye'. Among them is an unpretentious personage, whose sad, contemplating, tear-washed countenance at once tells that she, too, belongs to the good-bye party—it is the mother of one of the parting boys; she doesn't shout, she doesn't speak, with bowed head she only sheds a tear in silence. Ah! It is the stream of a molten heart for her boy and her country.

"You want to know how to dry a tear, come to the devastated towns in Russia, in Poland, in Palestine, behold our brethren bleeding, fainting, starving, crying for help. In their maddening suffering, they cry out in the language of Jeremiah, 'Oh, that my head were waters, and mine eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night'. Beholding this heartbreaking distress and listening to this soul-rending plea, what are we, in a happier land and under happier circumstances, to do? What is our holy duty? Pity them, sigh with them, weep with them? That won't heal their wounds, that won't clothe their nakedness, that won't feed these starving men, women and children; aye, that won't dry their tears.

"The American Jewish Relief Committee is telling us what it is doing to alleviate their suffering; it is raising $10,000,000, and in the name of mercy this committee appeals to the membership of this congregation for a liberal contribution to this great charitable mission, and, on this Eve of Eves, the Sabbath of Sabbaths, I pray of you, respond, and respond as generously as your means allow. Every dollar you give for those sufferers will heal a wound, will feed a hungry child, will dry a parent's tears.

"In this hour of solemn hushness, we, too, shed a tear of prayer; we pray for life, for joy, for spiritual uplift, for material success. And it is only by helping to dry the tears of others with our deeds that we may feel confident that our tears of prayer will be stored in God's treasure and recorded in God's book, and that what we sow in tears we shall reap in song".

Neighborhood Synagogues

By Dr. Max L. Margolis

Written for the B'nai B'rith News

In the simple conditions of the ghetto, when the area occupied by Jewish residents was a small one and every Jew was neighbor to every other Jew, the synagogue, or the cluster of synagogues in the "Schulhof," was a neighborhood institution. It was naturally within walking distance from everybody's home. Of course, walking distances, as in the story of Diogenes, differ according to a person's gait. Those who disdained pedestrian exercise even within the limits that were permitted by law, might assemble in a private residence and establish a temporary and more convenient place of worship. Other motives played into the separation from the main community. Sometimes the cantor or the rabbi or some synagogue officer, be he beadle or president, might be distasteful to a wealthy or learned man in the community who thus chose to surround himself with a group of his own. On the high holidays these sectional places of worship were closed, and the entire community assembled in the chief synagogues. Even in our present conditions in our large cities it can be seen that the earliest sites of the various synagogues were close by, simply because they were the centers of the Jewish area. Then, as Jews began to move away, first singly, then in groups—for where one Jew establishes himself, he will be soon joined by other co-religionists—synagogues moved likewise. Naturally the moving of a synagogue to a new neighborhood coincided with the last stages of the movement away on the part of the members. The new neighborhood had to become largely and compactly Jewish before the moving of the synagogue further up town or into a suburb became possible. Often it happened that a neighborhood had become changed for a decade or two, so much so that not one single member lived in proximity to the old synagogue, before the house of worship was transferred to the new habitat. It must not be forgotten that a synagogue building represents a capital and that moving implies loss. It is generally though not always so. Where, of course, a synagogue finds itself surrounded by skyscrapers and the area around it has become the seat of business, the commercial value of the property is considerably enhanced. Then there are sentimental reasons for hesitating to part with a site and building that have become sacred to generations. The orthodox Jew who will not use a vehicle, whether street car or automobile, will find that sentimental reasons must be overridden; he must have a neighborhood synagogue. Either he remains in his old abode, though he may dislike the neighborhood, or if he moves away he must bide his time until his new locality becomes ripe for a neighborhood synagogue. But even those who have no scruple about using a vehicle—and riding on the Sabbath is by no mans the sign of reform—find it irksome to send their children to the synagogue school too far away from the home, or possibly situated where children had better not be seen. And so the problem of neighborhood synagogues becomes acute everywhere. I remember a city where the women long preferred to retain their synagogue in the old down town district because it was contiguous to the shops and theatres, and worship on a Sabbath morning might advantageously be followed by shopping or amusement. Eventually the synagogue did move up, and now I am told that the suburb has been invaded by so many "foreign" Jews that it is no longer aristocratic. The course of future events may easily be predicted. The Temple will be sold to the newcomers to be converted into a "Schule", and the Temple will follow the members to their new habitat.

The "foreigners" by no means cling to their down town habitat. Wealth comes to them quite as rapidly as to the older strata of the Jewish community. And so they keep moving, their places being taken by immigrants freshly arrived. But even the poorer brethren migrate. Whole colonies of small shopkeepers establish themselves in certain localities. Being of the orthodox persuasion, they require a neighborhood synagogue. I say orthodox. The orthodoxy is mainly of the prayer book variety. These Jews trade on the Sabbath day as flagrantly as the rich department store owners. They will shut up shop on the high holidays, while the department stores, I am told, keep open. What I say pertains to the majority. There is always a nucleus of observant Je[illegible] a small chevrah is established. Soon a small house of worship is built. How the small membership can afford to do it is sometimes a mystery. Probably there is a mortgage on the property. Be it said to the credit of these pioneers that their zeal is certainly most praiseworthy. And let us not look down upon them. They may not be the people we should like to associate with. They are not of our class. But the small shopkeeper of today will be the rich merchant and banker of tomorrow. In these days of rapidly acquired wealth the transformation occurs within a few years. Wealth buys culture. Sometimes, it is true, the father remains impossible. But the mother and the children acquire the graces of civilization with a remarkable celerity. The children are sent to private schools and are welcomed there. Those that ascend will in all likelihood abandon their old time associations and even seek their religion in the more fashionable Temple to which they may repair in their automobiles. Enterprising pastors will seek them out. So much the more difficult it becomes for the neighborhood synagogue to develop.

Yet it is these neighborhood synagogues that should be supported. Were our communal life built upon European models, the community would come to their assistance. Often the poor colony is not distantly located from a residential district in which are scattered the homes of wealthv or cultured Jews. The latter for the most part belong to synagogues down town or affiliated with no synagogue at all. It were idle to expect of them that they will join their poorer co-religionists, although in the house of God there should be no distinction between the rich and the poor. Still the colony has a claim upon their financial and moral support. Surely the well-to-do Jew who lives in the midst of a Christian community having their neighborhood churches for every denomination should not like to see the Jewish house of worship in the neighborhood made conspicuous by unattractive conditions of site and sight. He should therefore come to the assistance of his brethren and materially help them. "Separate not thyself from the community'. This applies to the neighborhood community. He who has the means to give should give. He who can help by his moral attachment should help. Those people mean well. They may have manners not exactly pleasing. Their mode of service may not be to our liking. This has no reference to the ritual. For all rituals lend themselves to decorum. In fact an orthodox service, being the more formal, can be made decorous. It is not the ritual that is indecorous, it is the people. And the people may be made amenable to decorum by example. Then there are the children. They need instruction, or they will drift away from all Judaism. It is a duty to keep parents and children together. They should worship together. The elders must be taught accommodation to their surroundings, so that the children may not be estranged from them. He who encourages a rift in the family, strikes at the morality of the children. There is no morality without authority, and the authority of the parent is paramount. Modernize the school. Soon enough the "Schule" will be modernized, too. Not that the ritual should be modernized. Only that decorum must prevail. There are certain exigencies of the modern life that effect reforms from within. The suburban Jew, and be he of the poorest sort, breathes a different air. It is purer. He lives in better quarters. He must learn very soon that a place of worship must be scrupulously clean and neat and the behavior of worshipers orderly. The segregation of the sexes cannot be quite as rigorous as down town, for sheer lack of accommodation. All that can be utilized to make the neighborhood synagogue of the poor a point of pride to the rich must not be overlooked. By all means come to their assistance, to the assistance of well-meaning people who are the builders of Judaism in this country.

A HILSNER INTERPELLATION.

The Kabbalah (Cabala) or Esoteric Doctrine in Jerusalem

A lecture delivered in the Henry Jones Lodge, I. O. B. B., by Dr. Samuel Adler in 1869, which, however ought to prove of interest to the present-day membership.

(Translated from the German original.)

The subject of my discourse, to which I would crave your kind attention, is called the "Kabbalah (Cabala) or the esoteric doctrine in Judaism. Kabbalah, esoteric doctrine—what might that be? Under which classification of human brain work might it belong? Is it a science? No, for it is not based upon cognition, it is not the result of logical thinking or research, which alone would warrant the honorable title of science. Is it fiction or poetry? Again we must say nay, as it does not represent its creations and descriptions as original figures of its own fancy, as the garment for ideas, but it does attempt to establish them as actual facts. The Kabbalah is rather the result of a spiritual activity, which conjures up within fanciful visionary souls a picture of an imaginary world, like a realm of dreams, wherein light and darkness mingle in confusion, wherein ghastly figures bestir themselves, but all of which appear to the dreamer as actual realities; it is a spiritual activity, which justly has been denominated "Mysticism".

The very first question for our consideration is: How did mysticism ever gain admission into Judaism? The Bible furnishes no occasion therefor, as in it everything is light and clearness; everything is concisely defined, is made plain to our understanding, and all pondering about gloomy subjects, beyond our own comprehension and experience, is kept aloof with consistent rigor. A convincing proof of this assertion, if proof be necessary, is furnished us by the Karaites, whose sole banner was the Bible and nothing but the Bible. They have studied the Bible more thoroughly than did any other Jewish sect, and upon the basis of their biblical studies they have cultivated all branches of theological sciences, such as grammar, exegetics, Halachah and even religious philosophy, but of the Kabbalah they knew nothing whatsoever. To the full extent of our knowledge of their literature we cannot find a trace of any reference to mysticism.* This should be ample proof that the study of the Bible in no way encourages or contributes to mysticism.

The earliest post-biblical authorities have also raised their warning voice, in genuine biblical spirit, against brooding and researching into domains which are beyond the human faculty of perception.

An old Mishnah (Chag. 2, 1) cautions against research and discussion of the biblical story of the creation and warns most emphatically against the contemplation of the visions of the prophet Ezekiel, who saw the heavens opened and who described the throne of God. The post-biblical and pre-Talmudic Ben Sira, who is considered as an authority by the Talmudic writings, says: "Do not attempt any research into whatever may be concealed from you; do not try to fathom what is hidden from you. Carefully consider what is accessible to you, but do not meddle with mysticism and secret doctrines". With such admonitions, how was it possible for mysticism to gain a foothold within Judaism?

It would seem easy to guess the correct answer. The Kabbalah is a plant of foreign origin, which in the course of time was transferred to the soil of Judaism. This answer is in conformity with the facts and is supported by history. At the same time it can only be fully understood, when we know how the soil had been prepared for the reception of this foreign growth.

It can be safely asserted that within every human being, to a smaller or greater extent, there exists a tendency toward mysticism, for in man there is the constant intermingling of the actual and the visionary, which form the very essence of mysticism and therefore encourage the tendency toward mysticism. Here, as everywhere in life, the extremes meet. The ignorant and the pretenders of omniscience were at all times the servants and the promoters of mysticism. The pretenders of omniscience, insatiable in their curiosity, in their disregard of the natural limitations of the human faculty of perception, attempted to forcibly break through the bounds of the tangible things without ever being able to attain the intangible, whereby they drifted into regions of mist, wherein they accepted as actual facts the whimsical combinations of creations of their own fancy. Thus they became the creators of an imaginary spiritual world, which does not exist outside of their own visionary fancies. The ignorant, on the other hand, like children, always show a predisposition for everything strange, miraculous, venturesome and monstrous, and are the more prone to accept in awe and reverence any assertion or fiction told as fact, particularly when such are far beyond their own faculty of comprehension. The main thing with them is that sentiments and fancies are subject to unsual emotions. Inasmuch as the larger majority of human beings belongs to the class of grown-up children, there is always ample ground available within mankind for the cultivation and propagation of mysticism.

Besides the dualism in the nature of man, it is religion which contributes its share to imbue weak souls with mysticism. A religion may be ever so pure, so clear and radiant as the sun, the origin of the sunlight is still a dark secret for us, an unsolved riddle. Religion in its profoundest depths is rooted in domains, which are intangible and inaccessible to the human understanding. For this reason Judaism, too, offers ample opportunity for a kind of contemplation, which might readily turn into mysticism. God, the revelations, prophetism are themes which at all times have been subjects for the deep contemplation of many, but upon which a very few only were capable of gaining a clear conception. Furthermore, it cannot be denied that even our clear and plain biblical scriptures contain many scattered passages which, if accepted literally, might smooth the way to mysticism. In the first line there are the angels, of whom the Torah speaks in its legendary tales; then there are dreams and their interpretation. There are the Urim and Thumim, some kind of an oracle upon the breastplate of the High Priest. This is something so strange and foreign to Judaism, so thoroughly in conflict with the spirit and the essence of Judaism, that the faith in the literal truth thereof could not fail to throw wide open the doors to mysticism. Besides these there are many passages in the Scriptures that would require a scholarly training and profound learning, in order to prevent them from being construed as of a mystical tendency. Such passages are, for instance, Chapter VI of Isaiah, Chapter I of Ezekiel, the books of Zachariah and of Daniel, the tales of miracles of Elias and Elisha, and many others of similar content.

Inasmuch as the Jewish soil thus was amply prepared by the human nature and the religious superstitions, it proved an easy task during the course of history to sow the seed of mysticism. The plowshare of history, the sorrowful fate had torn open and furrowed that soil and fertilized it and thus insured a bountiful harvest. Cheerful conditions of life, bringing contentment, are inimical to the propagation of mysticism. Sorrowful times and dismal surroundings produce sad and morose spirits. Surely Judaism during its long course of history has never lacked dire times, and, in fact, its darkest periods were always accompanied by a profuse development of the Kabbalah.

The first exile, the Babylonian, was the cradle of the Kabbalah, for in Babylon the Israelites first learned the names of the angels from the Chaldeans. It is true that prior to that period there had existed among the Jews some kind of a hazy notion about angels, but that was more like a mystery to which the key was lacking; it was something like a God, something supernatural and intangible, that the human conception could not grasp. With the knowledge of the names of the angels, they became familiar beings; they were personified and multiplied; they were given shape and body as well as vocation, and with that the first step for the Kabbalistic theories were gained. During the succeeding period of Persian suzerainty the domain of the Kabbalah grew apace. By the intercourse with the ancient Parsees, the adherents of the religion of Zerdusch, the Jews were made acquainted, besides the realm of light, with the domain of darkness; they gained information of the different good angels, but also of a Satan with his hordes of subordinated evil spirits. As the weeds always grow and spread more rapidly than do the useful plants, so the realm of darkness became quickly and densely populated upon the fertile soil of an inflamed imagination. While there was but a limited number of good angels, the hordes of the spirits believed to be evil grew into vast multitudes. A Babylonian Rabbi said: "Each one of us has a thousand on his left side, but billions on his right side". (Ber. 6, a.) The Talmud is entirely correct in its statement of the nature of the "Massikim" (evil spirits) when it says that they are prolific and increase like mankind. (Chag. 16 a.) They surely do increase and multiply in the imagination of men.

The Persian reign was in turn followed by the Egyptian-Ptolomeian suzerainty. At that period Alexandria was the principal seat of learning, the central sun from which the beams of thought spread in all directions. Here the Kabbalistic agitation gained new accession, and this time from a source whence it was to be the least expected, from philosophy.

It was the custom of the old-time philosophers, in order to make their doctrines inaccessible to the great masses and thereby safeguard them against misconstruction, to cloak their wise sayings in short, obscure and ambiguous sentences, which were elucidated to their pupils only. This, however, had the very opposite effect; that their sayings were misapprehended and became the subject of mystical misconstruction. Thereby Pythagoras, the wise thinker, has been called, against his own wishes, the father of mysticism, as from his doctrines, hidden in symbols of numbers, a system of numerical secrets has been deduced, according to which secret and mystical powers are inherent to the numerals and to particular combinations thereof. At that period large numbers of Jews lived in Alexandria. Philosophy and poetry were their favored studies, and Jewish thinkers have shown great partiality for the study of these mystical problems. According to Josephus, the sect of the Essenes was particularly devoted to the researches and practices of these secret, mystical doctrines.

Thus the germs and the elements of the Kabbalah were collected and increased from many sources. In the Talmud, that vast store house of grain and chaff, most of these elements have found a scattered but permanent storage. The middle ages, when the terrible oppression had rendered the life within Jewish circles unbearable and hopeless, served as the incubator for the hatching of this brood of germs, so that they developed rapidly and grew in exuberance into numerous varying systems. The dreariest period of the middle ages, the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, the time of the crusades, may safely be considered as having given birth to the systematic Kabbalah proper. From that period date the oldest writings of the Kabbalah and the book Sohar, the sacred cannon of the Kabbalists, was compiled about that time. Prior to that period but little had existed in the form of Kabbalistic writings, and that little never had been deemed worthy of being collected for future preservation. The Mishnah, that sublime work comprising the entire Judaism, which was concluded about the end of the second century, is absolutely without any trace of Kabbalistic admixture. The Baraitoth of the period immediately following the compiling of the Mishnah already breathe considerable of Kabbalistic spirit. One Baraita (Kidd. 71 a) is acquainted with a name for God consisting of 12 letters; others contain new names for angels (Ber. 7 a). Many of them tell of the events in heaven (Chag. 13 ff). Neither do these writings lack stories of ghosts and miracles, nor the apparition of the prophet Elijah and similar tales. The earliest and most prominent Amoraim, Rabbi Johann in Palestine and R. Abba in Babylon established rules as to who might be initiated into the secrets of the names of God (Kidd. a a O). One of their pupils, R. Ammi, speaks of "Sisre-Torah", of the mysteries of the Torah (Chag. a a O). Still all these sayings were only isolated fragments. The secret doctrines were not formed into a system, nor did they become incorporated into the Jewish literature until the dreariest period of the middle ages. It might be maintained that for nine centuries after the conclusion of the Mishnah Judaism was pregnant with the secret doctrines, the succeeding century then gave birth to the Kabbalistic mysticism, and a century later the child was already self-reliant and overflowing with strength.

Only after attaining such independence and strength did the child assume a name for itself, the well-known name of Kabbalah, meaning tradition, or rather the oral tradition. The meaning of that name should, however, be properly understood. In the very earliest days, before that term ever was applied in this sense, and when the few mysteries were not yet entrusted to writing, but were only transmitted by word of mouth, the name of Kabbalah might have a correct appellation. At the period of the origin and the coming into use of that name, however, that term could only imply a meaning similar to the name "Saggi Nahor", the keen-sighted, wherewith the Talmud designates the blind; for at that very period the tradition had completely ceased and every Kabbalistic writer only reflected the hallucinations of his own brain. But in fact the Kabbalistic authorities did not desire the term of Kabbalah understood otherwise than as mysticism, and we need not wonder thereat, for in no other sphere of literature and of life has there ever been more self-deceit and also quite naturally the deception of others, nowhere have more white lies been told than in the realm of the Kabbalah. It is a remarkable fact that hardly a single one of the older Kabbalistic writings bears an honest title. This is strange but true. The earliest authors of these writings sought to gain the confidence of the people under false pretences, and only after such confidence was established did they begin to issue their publications under their own names. During the twelfth and thirteenth centuries there were numerous Kabbalistic writings manufactured, the authorship whereof was shamelessly accredited to the most renowned teachers of the Mishnah. One of these books is claimed to have been written by the High Priest Eli; another has even been attributed to our progenitor, Abraham, and still another was furnished its credential by the claim that its author was none other than Adam, the first man. The most prodigious among these consummate liars, however, is the sacred Sohar. That book is full of visionary fancies that are represented as actual facts, and of sayings claimed as the utterances of the older celebrities of past centuries. Such downright falsifications throw a glaring light, or rather a glaring shadow upon the times when such things were possible, for they were possible only because the then prevailing ignorance believed them to be facts.

The mysticism was thus transplanted as a foreign growth unto the Jewish soil, but once it had taken root there and secured nourishment from Jewish elements, it soon assumed Jewish shape and contents.. The Hebrew name of four letters for God became the central object of mystical research and meditation. It was considered the climax of Kabbalistic wisdom to juggle at every opportunity with this holy name by various combinations of the letters thereof and in all possible variations. Yea, this was considered the surest means of working miracles, and for this reason one merely familiar with the Kabbalistic lore was designated by the popular appellation as a "Baal Kabboloh" (Kabbalist), while a wonder-working Kabbalist was given the honorable title of "Baal-Shem" (a man versed in the secrets of the divine name).

In the second line the old tabernacle with all the utensils used therein, more especially the chandelier with the seven branches, proved favorable subjects of mystical interpretation. In the further course of development the Kabbalah attempted to spread its net over the entire Jewish religious laws, both the biblical and the Talmudical laws, by endeavoring to furnish some references and ascribing some direct influence of higher spiritual imaginary powers to every religious precept and practice. According to the Kabbalah it mattered not what might be the meaning of any religious precept or practice in and for life, but what effect they might produce upon the higher spiritual world, was the idea and the purpose of law and practice. But even with this the Kabbalah was not completely satisfied; it went still further. The entire sacred writings, the Bible and, not any the less, all the existing commandments, all became for the Kabbalah a source of inexhaustible subjects for gloomy meditations and mystical misconstructions. There exist a great number of books—the Sohar again at the head of the list—which are exclusively devoted to the Kabbalistic interpretation of the Bible; again there are a number of other books wherein the prayer book is made the subject of Kabbalistic explanation; the number of books furnishing, besides the accepted exegesis, the Kabbalistic version, is legion. During the middle ages it was an established maxim that the Torah was capable of a fourfold explanation, all four being of equal value and being equally true. The technical term, therefore, is "Pardes," being the abbreviation for "Peshat, Remes, D'rush and Sod", meaning the simple, the symbolic, the demonstrative or rhetoric and secret or Kabbalistic explanations. But these Kabbalistic definitions did not apply to the contents or the text alone, but they also, and even by preference, were applied to the form, the words and letters, and in later days even to the vowels and vowel points. Everything took on life and in the eyes o fthe Kabbalists changed into receptacles of profound mysteries. All writings for them were the bearers of mystical wisdom, that might become plain to the inspired researcher through the analysis and the combination of the letters and through other expedients.

Thus the spirit of mysticism, a foreign intruder, has wormed itself into Judaism, and after the strenuous efforts of many hundreds of years it has succeeded, not only in gaining citizenship, but also in becoming a power, yea, a terrible power, within Judaism. Still—and that furnishes the proof of the uninterrupted inward strength of Judaism—even during the period of the most exuberant flourishing of the Kabbalah there always existed a high wall of separation between the legalistic Judaism and the mysticism. The world bowed down before the commands of the Kabbalah, but would not permit it to exert a decisive influence upon the shaping of the religious concerns. No matter to what extent the Kabbalah assumed Jewish attire and ornaments, how solemnly it paraded within the Jewish camp and permitted itself to be venerated as a high-born matron, its foreign origin and its strange essence in unmistakable contrast to all Jewish doctrines always were felt and mistrusted. The Halacha always eyed it askance and avoided it. The Talmud already mentions as an example a dispute between R. Elieser Haggodol, a prominent teacher of the law and at the same time a profound mystic, and his associates. (According to my own opinion, this scholar was a leader among the Essenes.) In that discussion R. Elieser attempted to gain the decision on a mooted point of the law by basing upon some miraculous signs, but he was rebutted by the quotation from the Bible: "It is not in heaven" (Deuteronomy XXX-12.) The Torah had been given to man and can only be explained according to human cognition and research. (B. Mez. 59 b.) Indeed, it may be considered fortunate that such a case occurred and was given so lucid a decision in the Talmud; for that decision was recognized as authoritative for all times to come and the casuistry was bound by it. Without the aid of such a precedent the Halacha might not have been able during the dreary medieval days to offer such determined opposition to the then powerful Kabbalah. In order to forestall all improper influence of the Kabbalah upon the Halacha, the rule had been established during the middle ages that no one should be permitted to engage in Kabbalistic studies unless he had previously—making use of the current expression—"filled his stomach with 'Chass and Poskim'". (Talmud and Casuistry.) True, this rule was not generally adhered to; to the contrary, the fewest of the large number of Kabbalists could lay claim to any profound Talmudic erudition. At the same time the influence of these ignorant Kabbalists upon the Halacha was almost nil, and the few Kabbalists who were sound Talmudists conscientiously maintained the barriers which had been erected between Halacha and Kabbalah. One of the most remarkable proofs for this latter statement is furnished by Rabbi Joseph Karo, who lived during the sixteenth century. This Rabbi was devoted to the Kabbalistic ecstasy in an unusual degree. He believed himself to be in communication with a spirit, whom he called his "Maggid" (Precursor). This spiritual Maggid appeared to him regularly on every Friday evening and revealed to him the mystical explanation of the weekly Torah chapter, which explanations have been published under the title of Maggid. And this Rabbi Joseph Karo was the same man who had composed the Shulchan Aruch, thereby furnishing Judaism its religious legalistic form which has during centuries regulated the religious life of the ghetto. Under such circumstances we might be prone to assume that the Shulchan Aruch must abound in Kabbalistic sayings and sentences. Such is not the case. According to the best of my knowledge there is but one solitary precept in the Shulchan Aruch, which is without Talmudic basis and of purely Kabbalistic origin. That exception has proved a blessing to thousands. This is the precept contained in Or Ch.K. 551, which prohibits the whipping of school children during the three weeks intervening between the 17th day of Tammus and the 9th day of Ab.

Thus Judaism during the long and gloomy centuries has tolerated the spirit of mysticism, sometimes even fondled it, but always knew how to intrench and safeguard itself against it, so that it never could gain the ascendency over the inner religious life of Judaism.

There is another question demanding a reply, and that is, whether Judaism has remained wholly unaffected and uncontaminated by the contact with the Kabbalah—and that question, unfortunately, must be answered by a decided No. In the same way as Father Jacob had wrestled with a spirit during an entire night and had vanquished it, so did the intellectual legalistic Judaism struggle bravely against the stupid spectre of the Kabbalah and has conquered it. But in the same manner as that nocturnal visitor had inflicted an injury upon our ancestor which caused the latter to limp for a long while, so on its part did the sinister Kabbalah not fail to cause damage to Judaism from which it still is suffering to some extent. Unfortunately life is thus constituted; it never is regulated solely and alone according to the prescribed laws; there are other influences that cannot be avoided altogether. Thus the Kabbalah has succeeded despite the antagonistic religious legalism in ensnaring the intellects, in beclouding the senses, in implanting superstition and in infecting life with thousands of poisons. There is no rank nonsense that has not been proclaimed and given hearing in the name of the Kabbalah; there exists no absurd practice which has not been sanctified as a Kabbalistic mystery. Stories of ghosts and spectres have haunted the heads of both old and young; miraculous remedies were generally in daily use. Many of you will, no doubt, remember some of the superstitious customs of former times, such as the "Kemeoth" (Amulets) worn both by children and adults on the bare skin as protection against disparagement and other dangers. "Shemoth" sheets of paper bearing all kinds of mysterious figures and letters fastened to the bed curtains of women in confinement; of the dreadful circling of a knife around the body of a woman in confinement, which ceremony was repeated every evening and the knife then stuck into the bed: the "Pidyon Nefesh", the redemption of the soul and the changing of the names of the sick; that other custom, utterly unknown in ancient days, of giving children, whose physical condition caused alarm, the names of wild animals, such as Hirsch (deer), Wolf, Loeb (lion) as a protection for life; then the insane practice of the "Tekufa," which required that in each of the four seasons of the year every utensil used as a container of food or drink must have a piece of iron supplied to it, for otherwise a drop of blood from heaven would fall therein and poison the contents. Nowadays these practices have fallen into desuetude, even in the lives of the so-called most orthodox. But there were other inheritances from the Kabbalah, which have most stubbornly been preserved and which are considered as among the sacred practices and possessions of the Jews who still maintain that the outward observance of all the religious precepts is the only and the very essence of all piety. Among these practices are the traditional prayer before retiring; some of the holiday prayers, the so-called "Piutim", but principally the prayers of the pious societies attending the sick upon the deathbed, and their funeral rites. In these prayers angels, Satan and ("Shedim") demonology still play their merry or ghastly medieval parts. Then there are the "Kapparot" before the day of atonement, when a fowl is killed as a vicarious sacrifice, the superstition against marrying during the second half of the month, the little day of atonement ("Jom Kippour Koton") on the last day of the month, and even the seventh day of the Sukkot festival, which during the Talmudic times had been celebrated as a joyous harvest feast, but during the middle ages was changed into a kind of a belated and halting day of atonement, and as such is still considered by the orthodoxy, particularly that of the Anglo-Portuguese brand. All these, and many other abuses are the children of the Kabbalah. They are the bastard product created by the blending of mysticism with Judaism, but which gradually assumed the air of legitimacy despite the opposition of the highest authorities of Jewish lore.

Permit me to conclude this lecture by showing that even the gloomy and superstitious Kabbalah was not without all redeeming features. Indirectly, at least, it has done some good and has contributed a goodly share to the evolution of the sciences and the conditions of life in modern times. It was the Kabbalah, the desire to fathom its mysterious secrets which gave the first impulse to the Christian theologians to make the Hebrew language the subject of their studies and researches. During the second half of the fifteenth century, Reuchlein, longing for the knowledge of the Jewish secret doctrine, was forced to master the Hebrew language, and he found competent Jewish masters to instruct him. He compiled a Hebrew grammar for the use of Christian students, and thus he became the father of a scientific system among the Christians, the immense merit whereof cannot be underestimated by all lovers of truth. The number of books, written and published during these three and one-half centuries by Christian grammarians and exegetists, is legion. While there is among these books a large share of useless and unpalatable material, a considerable part thereof is of decided merit and must be given credit for having contributed to the development of Hebrew philology and the biblical exegesis.

But even within the Jewish circles the Kabbalah has not failed to indirectly promote new light and intellectual life, by the very fact that the extremes must react upon one another. The present-time Chassidism in Galician Poland is a child of the Kabbalah, even be it a terribly degenerated child. Drunkenness, intoxication of frenzy, raptured demeanor during the religious meetings and, on the other hand, lying, deceit and immorality of every kind are the doleful characteristics of its adherents. That was bound to counteract upon sound, strong natures, as in fact it has reacted. It must challenge them to thinking, to action and to conflict. Thus did this Kabbalistic degeneration cause a Joseph Perl in Tarnopol to erect a dam against the pernicious stream by founding and maintaining at his expense a Jewish primary and high school. That noble example has found some imitators, and many able men have secured their education at these schools. Through these schools there arose in Lemberg a small but spirited band of young men, a Rapoport and his associates, who sharpened their intellectual weapons in the combat against the chassidic humbug, and then applied their knowledge in service of scientific criticism and the study of antiquity, thereby opening new fields to the Jewish sciences. Thus we are indirectly indebted to the Kabbalah for the new school of critical research, whose disciples we are, and which is destined to release Judaism, not only from the mysticism, but also from the congealed and dead semblance of life. Out of the gloomy darkness will come forth the radiant light and its rays will beam constantly higher and brighter, sevenfold, as does the light of the sun.

"UNFAIR" TREATMENT OF GERMAN-AMERICANS.

The tide of indignation against lukewarm patriotism or euphemistic treason, which has steadily risen since our entry into the war, bears most heavily against foreign-language publications or those printed in English but conceived in alien thought. Now a reaction shows itself in the dread of some Americans of German descent who from time to time protest in letters to the press that they are the subjects of petty persecution because of their ancestry. This might be endured with some forbearance, but what such residents or citizens of the United States fear is that the treatment the German-American now receives will be "changed into something infinitely worse when the temper of the American people is still more inflamed." Thus it appears to Prof. Herman S. Ficke, of Dubuque, Ia., who in a plea for fair play addressed to the editor of the Congregationalist (Boston), says that his fear and the fear of his ilk is that those publications which conduct "a campaign of ruthless hate against the German-Americans by means of direct suggestions and still more dangerous insinuations," together with the readers influenced by these periodicals, will "so poison American sentiment that at the first disaster to American troops in Europe the Americans of German descent will receive the same treatment which is now being meted out to the negro." He bewails bitterly the position of the Americans of German descent, and avers that—

"Protestations of loyalty do not help, for one of the most influential weeklies of New York has said, 'Beware of the German-American who wraps the Stars and Stripes around his German body.' Even a stanchly American paper like The Nation has had to protest against employers discharging their workmen because they were German. When one looks at our comic periodicals it would seem that a campaign of ruthless hate against the American of German descent is an eminently desirable thing.

"This treatment is cruelly unjust. The Americans of German descent have no sympathy with a Prussian militarism or a Prussian aristocracy. We may say that the life of this nation depends upon the farmers of this race who are bending every effort that the broad acres of the west shall produce enough food to feed humanity. The records of the National Guard show that they have given their sons to the nation. In the disorders connected with the national day of registration hardly a German name is to be found."—Literary Digest.

The entire Italian Jewry is mourning his death. In thirty temples throughout the land memorial services were recited. Jewish orphan asylums which were supported through his munificence, Jewish Homes for the Aged, to the maintenance of which he contributed, and Hebrew Schools which he maintained, are bewailing his loss. The members of the "Culture Circle" of which he served as president for many years, is grief-stricken. The Jewish committees "Pro Causa Hebraica" and "Pro Hebraya Oppressa", who have lost in him their advisor and guide, the many Jewish scholars of the country among whom Ottolengi was the leader, have not yet recovered from the shock which his death caused.

The death of Professor Ottolengi also left its impress upon the entire population of Italy. For he was a vital factor in the life of his country and contributed much to the dissemination of the liberal thought and press. A contributor of the leading socialist organ "Forward" he was at the same time on the editorial staff of the periodical which served as the organ of the modern philosophy. In the Italian journalistic spheres, Professor Ottolengi was looked upon as the champion of liberty and justice and as one of the forerunners of the noblest ideal of the future—of universal brotherhood.

Professor Raphael Ottolengi was a son of wealthy parents, and comes of one of the most celebrated Jewish families in Italy. His grandfather, Rabbi Mordeccai Ottolengi, was famous as a Gaon and Cabbalist. His brother was the military instructor of King Victor Emanuel in his crown prince days and later was elevated to the post of Minister of Military Affairs.

The son of an influential and wealthy father, whose villas stretch over the length of the Adriatic shores, young Raphael had an opportunity of studying at leisure and of enjoying the best training which the European universities afforded. His connection with Jews and Judaism was expressed in a profound religious-fervor which is characteristic of all the Ottolengis. The Minister of Military Affairs to whom reference was made above, prided himself on the fact that he had never omitted one of the three daily prayers. But Professor Ottolengi came to know his people at closer range after the Russian pogroms of the "80's" when the cry for help emanating from Russian Jewry pierced the ears of the entire civilized world. He at once proceeded to study the Jewish literature to a very great extent. During his sojourn in Egypt as Italian consul, he undertook to familiarize himself with the languages and questions of the Orient. As a result of his study, he brought forth his now famous masterpiece "Voci l'Orienta"; Judaism, Christianity and Mohammedanism are philosophically treated in this monumental work. In that book he gave a profound interpretation of the ideals of the Seers of Israel and the authors of the Talmud, and introduced many Jewish ideals to Italian thought. Ascetic Christianty received the harshest criticism at his hands. In addition to that he established his deep knowledge of Oriental affairs, and to the day of his death was known as the greatest authority on Oriental affairs that Italy ever produced.

His funeral was the most impressive that the city of Acqui ever witnessed. He was known alike to the common people as to the educated classes, and the hosts that followed his hearse were made up of all classes of the population: Jews and Gentiles, aristocracy and the peasantry, representatives of the government as well as working people. Banners and emblems of the city of Acqui, of the local, civil and political organizations, of all synagogues and Jewish organizations followed the hearse.

The most profound impression was produced by Professor Francisco Bislo, who spoke at his open grave.

"Adieu, Oh, Raphaelo, my comrade, Oh you great spirit. Your country does not yet appreciate the loss it sustained through your death—"

His friends and followers have taken upon themselves the task of collecting and publishing the work of the deceased, and thereby to discharge part of the debt which the Italian Jewry owes to the learned Jew.

Judaism's Four Characteristic Traits: Loyalty and Universality, Rationality and Spirituality

By Dr. Kaufman Kohler

Saturday, Sept. 29, 1917, witnessed the formal opening of the forty-third year of the activities of the Hebrew Union College. The regular Sabbath afternoon services held in the college chapel were read by one of the students, and the occasion was signalized by an address by President Kaufmann Kohler, welcoming the old and new students to another year of study.

Israel's Share in World Construction.

Still filled with the lofty thoughts and sentiments aroused in mind and heart by the great days of solemn awe that ushered in the New Year, we have, under God's blessing, assembled here to take up anew the task of the Torah. Yet never before was this college opened in such serious times, full of anxiety and gloom, as this year. Many a one of the number of our students has been called away to serve our country in this terrible world war, and others have enlisted, but all are ready and eager to perform their duty as patriots loyal to the cause. And who, young or old, can be calm and at ease in this unprecedented, undreamed of world tragedy? A strange saying in the Talmud tells of a hidden place in the very heavens to which God himself withdraws to shed tears of sympathy over the woe of humanity. Truly this is a time for tears, even of heaven. Still we must learn to see in them the sparkling dewdrops of a new dawn for the world. The vast ruins wrought all over the lands will, in God's providence, lead to a reconstruction of the whole life of mankind, and we want to be assured that in this work of reconstruction, which sooner or later must come, Judaism, as the sublime faith in God and humanity, is destined to play a prominent part. In this spirit of hope and confidence in Israel's mission I want to address you today, taking as my text the glorious words of Moses (Deut. xxvi 17-19): "Thou hast avouched the Lord this day to be thy God in whose way thou shouldst walk. And the Lord hath avouched thee this day to be His own treasured people and to place thee high above all the nations He hath made, for praise and name and glory by being a holy people unto the Lord thy God".

The Fourfold Blessing of Israel.

What is it I ask that is to place Israel high above all the nations? Surely not territorial dominion or political power nor any of the cultural forces that made other nations great. Happy art thou, Israel; none is like thee, a people whose salvation and proud sword of victory is the Lord. These are the concluding words of Moses' farewell blessing. God, the most High, constitutes Judaism's greatness, the God of Faithfulness, the Father of Mankind, the God of Truth, the God of the Spirit and accordingly Judaism's characteristic traits are its loyalty and its universality, its rationality and its spirituality.

I.

Loyalt to Faith—Israel's Preservation.

Israel's God is above all the God of faithfulness, and the rainbow in the sky became to the Jew sign and pledge of God's faithfulness to His covenant with earth and heaven. So is the whole history of the Jew text and testimony of his enduring faith and faithfulness to his God. Is there a nation or a religion throughout history that can compare with Israel in loyalty? No host of warriors defied death or foe so bravely, none went through fire and water, or faced calamity and suffering so heroically as did the host of the battlers for the Only One God from the days of the Maccabees until this very day. And this unparalleled loyalty, this unflinching, uncompromising fidelity to our faith which made us the martyr-priest among the nations, the everlasting witness to the everlasting God, has not only preserved us so wonderfully; it has ever regenerated us and bestowed new life upon us when great empires and civilizations went down to make room for new ones. And this loyalty we still manifest in our regenerated life in synagog and home. Not they who admit unbelievers and apostates into their ranks as members of the Jewish nation can lay claim to loyalty, but all those who, whether under the rule of orthodoxy or under the banner of progress and reform hold fast to our ancient inheritance, to Judaism's everlasting truth, guided in all changes of form or views by the principle of continuity with our cherished past. Loyalty then to the principles of our faith we demand of all who come to us with the aim and purpose of becoming a bannerbearer and an exponent of Judaism. And this implies loyalty to our teachings and teachers, to our institution, to your Alma Mater, the fountain of Jewish wisdom at which you are to quench your thirst for knowledge.

Israel's Loyalty to Country.

But there is another loyalty Judaism ever insisted on and this is loalty to country. "Seek the peace and welfare of the city in which you will live, and pray for it, for in its peace you will have peace". With this significant monition did the prophet Jeremiah send forth his brethren into a land not their own, and henceforth loyalty to country was one of the leading virtues of the Jew throughout the ages. We Jews need not be taught the lesson of patriotism by our fellow-citizens. At the threshold of our history Abraham stands forth offering the pattern of a patriot fighting for the land of his sojourn and refusing to take any of the spoils after the victory he had won. Obedience to the laws of faith and devotion to the land in which the Jew lives were made the unalterable imperatives of the synagog; to that extent that often the Jew fought against his brother Jew, and service to the country was held paramount even at the neglect of Mosaic statutes. Read the story of the Jew in Babylonia or Alexandria, Spain or Italy, in western or eastern lands, under the sway of freedom or under fiercest tyranny, everywhere patriotism was ingrained in his soul. Whether as soldier on the battlefield or as statesman in diplomatic service, he distinguished himself in heroic devotion and zeal for the welfare and glory of the nation in whose midst he lived. Still more so in modern times, whether in Europe or America, he is outdone by none in winning laurels for bravery. In these trying days, therefore, no cloud of suspicion rests upon the Jew, no matter where his cradle stood or what foreign name he bears. And as our college ever stood for American Judaism, so do we, professors and students alike, prize American citizenship as our most precious boon, looking up with devotion and dignity to the starry banner as the symbol of liberty and human sovereignty, but we refuse to join in the furious cry of hatred of any nation or language, nor do we cast sand and mud into the well from which we have drawn a large part of our wisdom and knowledge. When Israel's song of triumph resounded at the Red Sea, we are told in the Midrash, the angels wanted to chime in, in the joyous song, but God hushed them, saying: "My creatures are drowned in the sea and you want to offer a song of praise unto me"? This is the spirit of Judaism.

II.

A United Humanity—Israel's Opportunity.

High above loyalty to country and nation towers Israel's ideal of a united humanity. Universality is the insistent and persistent aim of Judaism as voiced by prophet, psalmist and sage. "Oh that the time come speedily when all the nations will form one bond of brotherhood", is the prayer that rose up to God's throne from the heart of every worshipper at the synagog during the past holy days and the petition for the peace and union of all sons of men under God's all-encompassing reign forms the climax of every divine service of ours. This universalistic mission of the Jew, mapped out in inimitable language by the great seer of the exile, has been typified by our sages in Abraham when they say that he was sent to unite by his teaching and practice, a world divided and disrupted. So says Maimonides: The coming of Elijah as the herald of the Messianic time means peace and union among all men under the guidance of the Torah, Israel's truth, which will make them all realize that they are brethren.

International Judaism.

Today we seem, alas, further away than ever from the realization of this hope. And yet as the prophet says: "At the evening tide there will be light". This very collapse of our boasted civilization, this utter failure of all our progress betokens the moulding of a new heaven and a new earth by the hands of God, and here lies Judaism's great opportunity, if we but realize it. The world yearns and sighs for God, as never before, for a religion which points not to the other world for salvation, but works for the Kingdom of Heaven on earth by a life of perfect righteousness, peace and love. And no religion nor race can ever equal Israel, the prophet nation, in the power or the claim to send forth the genius that will write the law of God anew upon the heart of man and win all souls by the nobility of truth and the simplicity of doctrine offered. Not nationalistic, but international Judaism, can fulfill the divine promise to place upon Israel's brow the crown of a name and a praise and a glory eclipsing all nations on earth.

III.

Rationality Versus Rationalism.

And just as loyalty and universality form characteristic traits of Judaism which supplement one another, so also the other two traits I mentioned, rationality and spirituality. The bright jewel of Jewish doctrine is its being in full accord with the dictates of reason, its constant appeal to the intellect and the common sense of man. Not that religious truth is the outcome of pure reasoning, the result of philosophical speculation. Religion is always rooted in the soul, a matter of profound sentiment and deep emotion. God appeals to the heart before He appeals to the mind. But the unique grandeur of Judaism consists in the fact that it never presented itself as blind belief, spurning or condemning inquiry and free thought. It always invited and encouraged research; and Torah, the Law, became the synonym of learning. "For this is your wisdom and your understanding in the eyes of all the people", says the law giver in offering the Law as an inheritance to the congregation of Jacob. And as the human mind progresses with each generation of seers and thinkers, so did the Jewish truth, ever allying itself anew with the thought and knowledge of the time and environment. Upon this recognition of Judaism's continual process of growth and evolution throughout the centuries rests the structure of Reform Judaism, and this implies that no preacher or teacher in our ranks can speak with authority on any of the great problems and issues of life, unless he is familiar with the sources of our unique past. No rabbi can afford to cease studying and ever learning anew, in order to be able to teach. For mark well, it is not rationalism that we want and approve of, but rationality; that is, a religious view in perfect harmony with reason.

But this must be supplemented and deepened by spirituality, and this is a point on which I want to lay special stress, because it is too often overlooked and neglected. Spirituality is not a thing to be taught or imparted by study. It must be felt as the innermost power of the soul, as the glow of a heart touched by God, as the impelling force leading to life's consecration to the service of God and the highest ideals of man. Pure intellectualism fails to respond to or to recognize the need of prayer. It fills us with pride when we should be humble and reverential before God and things holy and godly. Spirituality does not mean other worldliness as the Church understands it, nor even such saintliness as the mystic exhibits which the sainted Dr. Schechter occasionally recommended to the students at the seminary. We want no saints who live apart from the people whom they are to win for the cause of God and goodness. We want lives permeated by the spirit that brings God nigh to men. We want hearts that draw ever new strength for noble work from solemn communion with God in prayer, souls that are filled with that humility that forgets self in the sacred cause they serve and that spirit of reverence which keeps them aloof from anything vulgar or profane. Such spirituality must again be voiced in the pulpit in place of the hollow formalism of ethics and the mere teachings of sociology which leave the craving of the soul for God unsatisfied. Such spiritualism must again permeate the Jew and the home to hallow the whole of the Jew. And you who are to be the future teachers and leaders of the congregation must foster this element of spirituality amidst your intellectual pursuits.

"This Is My Covenant."

In this spirit I welcome you all, our older pupils and the newcomers, for common work in preparation for the high vocation of priesthood among the priest-people of Israel. And so let me close with the prophetic words: This is My covenant with them, saith the Lord, the Spirit which is in thee and the word which I put into thy mouth—they shall not depart from thy mouth and from the mouth of thy seed and from the mouth of thy seed's seed, from now on and forever. Amen.

CENTRAL COMMITTEE FOR THE RELIEF OF JEWS SUFFERING THROUGH THE WAR.

Clothing and shoes for the destitute Jewish school children in Russia, of whom there are now 50,000 dependent on Relief organizations, are the crying need of the hour, declared Mr. Herman Bernstein, editor of the American Hebrew, who has just returned from that country where he went to study the conditions of the Jews after the revolution, in a report submitted to the directors of the Central Relief Committee, 51 Chambers Street, yesterday. The suffering of the Jews in Russia is appalling, he said, and urged the committee to dispatch at once clothing to that land before winter sets in. Mr. Bernstein added that permission for the shipment of this needed apparel could be had from Ambassador Bakhmetieff, who assured him recently that he could secure a permit from his government to put aside some space on outgoing steamers.

A committee composed of Mr. Bernstein, Julius J. Dukas, Rabbi Hirsch Masliansky, Judge Jacob S. Strahl, Rabbi Israel Rosenberg, of Jersey City, and Harry Fischel, treasurer, was appointed to attend to this matter.

Mr. Bernstein's report on the suffering of the Jews in Russia, in part, follows:

"We must take into consideration that all the youngest and strongest men of Russian Jewry are at the front, that many of those who devoted all their energies to Jewish work, especially to the one great Jewish cause which united all Russian Israel, are now scattered throughout Russia, working for various parties, in the preparatory activities for the constituent Assembly. In other words, the best and most enthusiastic workers for Jewish relief are lost for the present, at a time when the most intensive work is essential.

"In the meantime winter is setting in. The cost of living in Russia is fabulous. The cost of bread, of other necessities, of food, of clothing, of shoes, is prohibitive even for the moderately well to-do. The shares allowed by the relief committees to the refugees are not sufficient under present conditions to enable old people, the sick and the children to keep body and soul together.

"We must help, above all, the fifty thousand Jewish school children who have been cared for during the war by the Relief Committee. Without the young generation Russian Jewry will remain crippled morally and culturally, even as a great portion of it is now crippled physically.

"Something must be done without delay to keep these fifty thousand children from dying of hunger and cold during this winter. Even if the Russian Relief committee had millions to distribute it could not secure clothing and shoes for the refugees, and their children. The prices are too high and besides, it is next to impossible to buy clothing and shoes in Russia. It has, therefore, occured to me, and the Petrograd Committee agreed with me, that American Jewry could render no greater immediate service to Russian Jewry than by sending without delay, clothing and shoes for the fifty thousand martyr children who will otherwise be kept from the schools. I know how difficult it is to make shipments to Russia at the present moment. I know that Russia is using all its tonnage for munitions and hospital supplies, but I feel confident that a way can be found to arrange the shipment of such a gift to young Russian Israel. I have discussed this matter with Ambassador Bakhmetieff in Washington, and he assured me that he could secure a permit from his government to set aside space for a shipment of shoes.

"Let us enable the school children of the Jewish war sufferers to continue their Jewish education. Let us do something concrete which will be more welcome and better appreciated than any sum, however large. Let us help to keep up the Jewish spirit in the young Jewish citizens of the Russian Republic in these days of strife and alarm and unrest, so that they may grow to be the standard bearers of a free Jewry in a great and powerful republic".

NEARLY FIVE PER CENT OF JEWS OF CANADA VOLUNTEER FOR ARMY.

Rabbi Simon Glazer, of Montreal, is authority for the statement that in Canada there are only about 100,000 Jews and 4,500 of them have volunteered for the war abroad. A special battalion of 700 Jews carrying the Jewish flag of Zionism with the Union Jack, and each wearing the shield of David, left Canada for the front.

NEWS FROM LONDON

By Our Correspondent Dr. M. Epstein

London Sept. 16, 1917.

The proposal to form a Jewish regiment has dominated all interests in Anglo-Jewry during the past month. In our last letter it was stated that before deciding on the institution of a specifically Jewish unit the military authorities seemingly consulted neither any individual Jew nor any body of Jews. The sequel proves that it might have been an advantage if they had done so, for as soon as the proposal was made public, it was met with mixed feelings—some blessed it altogether, others were aghast at the idea; some talked of a "military ghetto" and were nervous lest the Jewish regiment should bring dishonor to the Jewish name. It was difficult to see why, but there was the fear. Others looked upon the designation Jewish as a mark of distinction, and expressed the hope that the regiment would prove a success. The community split into two camps over the question. The controversy overflowed into the general press. Even the Times had a leader or two on the subject. It was obvious that the prevailing difference of opinion would not improve the prospects of the new formation. Especially telling against the proposal was the argument that in this war Jews were fighting not specifically as Jews (whether that term be regarded as a religious or racial denotation), but solely and only as citizens of the land of their birth. They were in the field as Frenchmen or Englishmen or Italians, and therefore to seggregate Jews into a special battalion was a mistake. On the other hand, it was pleaded that various more or less loose bonds had been taken cognizance of in the formation of units. There was, for instance, the "Pals" battalion, or battalions of the same callings. Why, therefore, should there not be a Jewish battalion?

Throughout the controversy, however, everybody appeared to lose sight of the fact that the original suggestion was intended to facilitate the incorporation of Russian Jews into the British army. Whatever views may be held as to the wisdom of expediency of the measure, now that it is law, it must surely be conceded that any step which tends to make it easy for the law to be carried out is a step in the right direction. Everyone realizes that our Russian brethren are characterized by certain qualities peculiar to themselves. They may not be fully conversant with the language of the country; many of them would desire to have facilities for observing the religious ceremonies to which they have been long accustomed. In any event, a Jewish "atmosphere" and Jewish officers would clearly be a boon in the circumstances. That, we take it, was what the War Office intended to offer, and no more suitable chief for this battalion could have been chosen than Colonel Patterson.

The result of the controversy was that a deputation waited on Lord Derby, the Secretary of State for War, urging upon him certain considerations against the adoption of the description "Jewish", and against the use of certain Jewish tokens, such as the Shield of David, which it was originally intended to adopt for the proposed regiment. His Lordship was convinced by the facts, and ultimately it was announced that while the Jewish formation would be maintained, the unit would not be described as Jewish, nor would the originally planned Jewish emblems be adopted. Furthermore, a point of significance, the men would not necessarily be used in Palestine, but as and where the exigences of the war required. The deputation, which consisted of prominent Jews, was satisfied, and the matter rested there. Naturally the other side would not be outdone, and Lord Derby agreed to receive another deputation, which requested that the original scheme might be retained, but that if "Jewish" should not be generally acceptable as the designation of the regiment, it should be known by the name of the Maccabees. Lord Derby, however, informed the second deputation that the authorities had decided to abide by the decision communicated to the first deputation. But the Secretary for War gave the assurance that, wherever possible, the men would be allowed Saturday as their day of rest instead of Sunday, and kosher food would be provided for them. This concession would equally apply to their religious holidays. On active service such concessions could not be promised to them, nor did he think for one moment that they would expect that they should be. The deputation signified their assent to this.

There the matter rests, and one cannot help feeling that the Government is being generous in their treatment of the Russia Jews who are to be incorporated in the British Army. One passage in Lord Derby's speech to the second deputation deserves to be specially recorded. It runs thus: "They must remember that there were many thousands of Jews serving in all branches of the British Army, who, in many cases, had earned for themselves the respect of their comrades for their fighting capabilities". In view of this testimonial, why should there be any fear that the Russian Jews will prove to be any worse soldiers than their brethren already in the army. As regards the authority for hearing appeals from Russian Jews who may desire to claim exemption from military service on one ground or another, the Tribunal includes several Jews as members, and there is no reason for thinking that this body will not accord sympathetic treatment to the applicants coming before it. Of course, every tribunal must be judged by its work. A final judgment on this tribunal will not therefore be possible until later on. But judging from its composition there is no cause to fear that it will be specially harsh or unjust.

In the meantime fighting continues and Jews are doing their duty nobly. From time to time, as is only to be expected reports of casualties reach home, and Jewish parents and the Jewish community have to deplore many young lives whose loss is to be deeply regretted. Hospitals for the wounded also contain Jewish wounded, and Jewish cripples are among those who have been maimed by the war. The spirit of sacrifice which has spread abroad through the land has touched Jews as it has touched their fellow citizens. In the ravages of war the whole of humanity has been brought more closely together. It is to be hoped that this toleration, born of common sorrow, may long continue, bridging the cleft between human hearts, irrespective of doctrine or dogma, race or creed. It is a hard saying but it is worth saying—that if the war helps the world to realize a grand old Jewish ideal, the war will at least not have been in vain. What is this ideal? "Have we not all one Father? Hath not one God created us"?

Yet there is light in the shadow too. If Jews have suffered with their fellows, Jews have also experienced the gratitude of their fellows which is expressed in distinctions and promotions. One of the most interesting of the latter is the nomination of Mr. S. J. Marks to be Lieutenant-Colonel. This distinguished officer is well known among East End workers for his splendid success with boys. He was a manager of the Brady Street Club for Working Lads, and keenly interested in the Jewish Lads' Brigade. Marks is one of those men who possess the very great gift of loveableness. You cannot account for it. Men like he are not necessarily intellectual, or far-sighted or specially wise. But there is a something about them which makes you glad to be in contact with them. The Jewish boys among whom Marks was so popular in the pre-war days felt it, his colleagues felt it; and all who knew him will rejoice that his career in the army has been so distinguished.

Within the community there has been no great activity, as the summer recess generally continues until after the Holy Days of this month. One celebration, however, was carried out during the slack season. The Hampstead Synagogue celebrated its silver jubilee. Hampstead is one of the wealthiest suburbs in this city, and among its inhabitants there are many Jews who are blessed with the goods of this world. Twenty-five years ago a band of communal workers united to establish a place of worship in the neighborhood, and today they are entitled to rejoice as they look back and see how their efforts have been realized. Of the original founders of the synagogue one is our own Brother, Herbert Bentwich, the first president of the London Lodge, whose public spirit is undaunted, and who is ever ready to identify himself with good causes.

From the communal point of view, however, the quarter of a century of Jewish History in Hampstead is pretty barren. It must be admitted that those who moved to get the congregation established were actuated by exceedingly high aims. Theirs was to be a rallying ground for all views and schools; in the new synagogue the common factor in every outlook was to be laid stress on and cherished. Alas! for the vanity of human wishes! Before long all these aims were dropped, and the new congregation settled down as a constituent synagogue, the wealthiest in the United Synagogue entity. When the place of worship was first opened the most vital question was that of the minister. The congregation was on the point of obtaining the services of the Rev. Morris Joseph, famed already at that time as a scholar and a gentleman. But Mr. Joseph had stated in a sermon that he did not believe in sacrifices. Possibly most of the members of the new synagogue, if not all of them, agreed with him. But such is, or was, communal organization in London that the Chief Rabbi of the time "inhibited" Mr. Joseph, and the community was forced to look elsewhere for its minister. Of outstanding personalities in the Jewish ministry then there were not many. The available men with their limitations were earnest and hardworking. But as a rule their view was limited, and their attitude to the ministry was that it was a profession or calling. There was a lack of idealism; there was an insufficiency of culture. The men were too practical, priding themselves on their organizing ability and on their visitation work. It was in this spirit that Hampstead throve throughout the last twenty-five years; there was much talk and little wool. The contributions to charity of the Hampstead congregants were not small; both as individuals and as a congregation they stood out prominently. But in things of the spirit, in Jewish knowledge, in devotion to ideals, Hampstead is a howling wilderness. Several efforts have been made to set up a local Jewish Literary Society. There was always a little flicker and the light went out. When one compares the actual achievements of the last twenty-five years with what might have been, or with what is done daily in, say, many an American congregation, one realizes the intellectual and spiritual bankruptcy of many a synagogue congregation in London. We have no ideals and we have no tradition. Organization and organizations we have in abundance; we are over-organized. But the soul is fled. It is a lifeless mass. That is why one cannot help welcoming even the minutest signs of improvement, the least indication that the dead bones are beginning to move. The Chief Rabbi has just issued a little book of Jewish Thoughts for distribution among Jewish soldiers and sailors. We hope some copies will become available for those Jews who remain at home. The compilation may do more than a hundred lectures or a thousand sermons. Another promising institution is the series of University Extension Lectures organized by the Jewish. Historical Society of England. The courses have, as we know, aroused great interest in America, especially in Menorah circles, and these, as perhaps a larger public also, may be interested to learn that another ten lectures are in preparation on Jewish Historians and Jewish History. Is it not significant that lectures of this kind attract large audiences, while synagogues are comparatively empty?

A veritable battle of the books is in progress in Anglo-Jewry. Zionism has of late years made much headway among Jews in England, and the accredited leaders of Jewry looked superciliously on the movement which for a time was distinctly not fashionable. But it grew in strength and volume, and recently made itself felt even at the deliberations of the Board of Deputies. The accredited leaders of Jewry took alarm. What was to be done? Immediate action was essential. So they decided to print and distribute broadcast a series of papers wherein men of good name and fame set forth the other side, set forth that Jews were a religious community and not a nation, that many Zionists were atheists and agnostics, and that the great majority of the so-called Jewish Nationalist leaders have absolutely no interest in the Jewish religion. The curious thing about this propaganda is that the pamphlets contain no indication as to their origin. Nobody knows who sends them out, nobody knows who provides the funds for their distribution. Moreover, it would seem that professed Zionists are strictly excluded from the mailing list. All this is very undesirable. In the days when secret diplomacy is condemned utterly, surely the Anglo-Jewish community might be spared this exhibition. Whether Zionism be favored or condemned, it must be reckoned with. And what is to be said of the political capacity of men who dig up old papers and speeches, add to them new [illegible] and sermons, and hope to con[illegible] devotees of a strong movement [illegible] are mistaken. Zionists are Zi[illegible] cause of their conviction, [illegible] rate they know what they [illegible] zealots of this type likely to [illegible] verted by cold, black print? The [illegible]ents of the movement do not require ammunition. Their attitude surely is fixed. The whole propaganda will do no harm as it will do no good. But its futility is deplorable.

The war has brought forth the need for appeals on appeals in the cause of charity. The latest cry for help comes from Salonika, where the recent fire has devastated the Jewish community. The Rothschilds, with their usual tact and readiness to lend a helping hand to the needy, have already sent £1,000 as a first installment to the Mansion House Fund opened by the Lord Mayor of London. Jews will no doubt join their fellow citizens in following this excellent example. Then there comes an appeal for a million pennies for relief of Jewish victims in the war. The committee administering this fund rely on a bazaar to augment their funds. Finally, an appeal has been issued for the suffering Jews of the Holy Land. The solemn season of the Jewish year is a propitious time for making appeals of this kind. Let us hope that a year hence there will be no need for calls of this character, but that Anglo-Jewry will be busy on the work of reconstruction amid the blessings of a peace that will encircle the world.

"THE JEWISH CONGRESS".

To the Editor of the B'nai B'rith News.

A few months ago we postponed the Congress, because we were told that President Wilson had intimated the desirability of so doing.

We are told by men whose opinion is worthy of the deepest respect, that it is advisable to postpone the Congress again.

We do not wish to imperil its success.

We do not wish to be unreasonable.

But we do want a Congress that shall give dignified expression to Jewish ideals; the sooner the better, and not only a Congress here, but in every other country, leading one day possibly to a Pan-Jewish Congress.

I want, however, to point out—

1. It is no use memorializing the Great Powers to secure Jewish rights in lands where rights are denied, and it is no use of the Government of those lands agreeing to grant them, unless public opinion in those lands be educated to understand the injustice and anachronism of Jewish disabilities and to overcome the prejudice which undoubtedly exists against us in every country, in a varied degree according to the general education of each country.

2. A Jewish Congress should not be occupied only with the materialities identified with Jewish interests. We cannot secure abolition of Jewish disabilities unless we secure the respect of the community or nation in which we live; and we cannot secure that respect unless we live up to the highest standards of ethics.

Therefore, I contend that our immediate duty, whether the Congress be postponed or not, is to organize in every country a campaign of education of public opinion in favor of our people, showing the injustice of historical and present prejudices, showing how Jews in favored environment or country have nobly contributed to the upbuilding and prosperity of that country.

And there must be an education of Jewish public opinion to realize first, that a Jewish Congress must be composed of Jews, not of radicals, socialists or atheists; and second, that a Jewish Congress, to be true to Jewish idealism may not only protest loyalty to the Government, which ought to go without saying, but it must give a ringing message to the world, condemning modern conditions that permit a war such as the present, with its crime, cost and curse. And a Jewish Congress ought to propose a practical solution. Surely there is one, or the happiness of man on earth becomes an impossibility.

One other thought: Whatever may be our wishes concerning a Jewish Congress, we are Americans here. Therefore, all we wished and planned before America declared war, must be more carefully made subservient to the wishes of the American Government now actually at war, and not as it was up to April last, a neutral.

Be not hasty to disprove every aspersion that is cast on you. Let them alone for a while, and, like mud on your clothes, they will rub off of themselves. —Rev. Dr. Murray.

WINTER ACTIVITIES.

After the months of recreation followed by the season of holidays, communal leaders and the guiding spirits in all sorts of committees and organizations begin their winter campaign. Not that the work rests at any time of the year; and certain active chairmen take their work with them wheresoever they may lodge. But the principal work is done in the winter months when the people, those that contribute the sinews of war, are in town. No doubt eloquent preachers have told the people on the sole occasion when they meet them in the synagogue, what the particular wants and the particular activities are to be this winter. The poor are always with us. The local charities must be kept going. But this winter there will be greater distress. It is true circulars have been distributed by the Food Administration urging one meatless day a week. Well, the poor will probably without much urging, for sheer necessity, have more than one meatless day in the week. With prices high for staple commodities, with the loaf of bread diminished in size and increased in price, there will be great hardship, and the poor will feel it most keenly. Then there is the indirect taxation which the consumer will have to pay in one way or another. Think of the high prices for coal. We have fortunately not gotten to the point that, as in Switzerland for instance, a ton of coal costs a hundred dollars and no one is permitted to heat more than one room in the house. Be it said, however, that with all sorts of dictators and all kinds of outlay of money for administrative work we have so far not witnessed any appreciable reduction in the cost of living. Of course, large bodies move slowly. Just at present it would seem as if the high prices were in the process of being legalized. So there is the prospect of great need for help among the poorer classes, despite increased opportunities for labor in certain branches. The rich will be called upon to materially increase their charitable subscriptions. Then there is the Relief Fund. It is very much like the Liberty Loan, that it seems to require much advertising and soliciting and coaxing; yet it is unlike the loan to the government that it is not likely to be oversubscribed. Yet give we must, in spite of the thought that even the millions will be like a drop in the bucket. But when we are told that in Syria babies are fed on grass, the strings of our purses will be unloosened. Then there will be so many extraordinary activities in the line of Army and Navy Welfare Leagues, and it is certainly gratifying that our Order, true to its character, is active in that most necessary work. The morale of an army depends on a thousand and one things, besides an efficient commissariat. As an offshoot of general charity work, it must needs be sectarian, to the extent that each denomination must care for its own soldier members, by no means to the exclusion of those who belong elsewhere. On the field no discrimination shall be made or ought to be made, when all are brothers in arms and alike animated by lofty patriotism. The spiritual needs of the Jewish soldiers must be taken care of. In times of peace the religious spirit may lie dormant. But in the face of danger the soul yearns for support, and it is well that there should be Jewish chaplains to minister to the soldiers, to be with them in the dark hours, to be their counselors and confessors, confessors in the truer sense. A prayer book for the use of Jewish soldiers has been prepared. Aside from its extreme usefulness, it is a gratifying sign of the unity that it is possible to establish in Israel when the extremes are willing to come together and to submerge their differences for the common good. We shall have our hands full with the care of dependents. All of which will serve to enlarge our sphere of work which normally increases year by year. Everywhere new congregations are forming and new schools for religious instruction opened. The demand for religious instruction is always greater than the supply. But we will not dwell on the normal activities. We are living in extraordinary times. While immigration is at a standstill, there are all kinds of people that are driven hither. We have in particular among us the emissary, the meshullah of olden times. Such men come to our shores at all times. But their number is now naturally increased. As the belligerent nations are sending their special missions each to its allies, so the Jews of one land send their missions to the Jews of another. Some of these emissaries are self-appointed, or readily receive an appointment from some organization. They tour the country, they are met with everywhere, they occupy pulpit and platform, and all of them ask for contributions for one scheme or another. The schemes, it must be owned, are all worthy; only be it remembered that the pocketbooks are not so easily replenished. It is really astonishing to see how much is given, and given to anybody who can persuasively appeal. It might be desirable to concentrate all giving. There is waste in overlapping. But so long as the people are willing to part with their money, it is all good and well. It is to be acknowledged that an undue amount of misery exists and that it must be relieved. And relieved it will be in one form or another, through one channel or another, through one manner of activity or another during the coming winter months.

THE UNITY OF ISRAEL.

Is the unity of Israel broken? and how is it to be restored? It is not exactly the disunion created by the world war which brings up this question, for the Jews are not in any worse condition than Catholics or Protestants, or, for that matter, other peoples related by ties of blood, language, and culture. Jew confronts Jew not as a Jew, but as an American or British or Teuton subject. Across the battle line hostile Jews are at one in summoning the last breath for confessing the Unity of God. Just now, it is true, humanity is divided into two warring camps, and under the heel of the soldier's march all the finer concerns are trampled. The shaping of the political map of Europe and its dependencies is in the forefront of attention. All else must wait. The thinkers of the nations have for the moment abdicated. When abroad death and starvation stalk, the mind is externalized and gazing within becomes as unprofitable as gazing at the stars. The war spirit has invaded the churches, and preachers know only of one topic, which really means a surrender of religion to patriotism. The disunion rampant in Israel antecedes the war. Just now the Jew who has gone farthest in breaking away from the traditions of the past is becoming awake to the rift which none can gainsay. It were idle to minimize the importance that attaches to forms. Life is made up of minutiae, and it is the little things that count. The symbols and signs are visible. The truth of the matter is that the synagogue no longer unites, it rather disrupts. You cannot empty yourself of all traditional content, and then proclaim that you have kept the elusive spirit. The forms are there to clothe the spirit, and when the forms change the spirit is likewise transformed. It is true, the two camps of Israel speak of interpretations of the same faith and the same hope. But the interpretations may so differ as to virtually emphasize the break. Christianity was but an interpretation of Judaism. Soon enough it ceased to be Judaism. It is likewise true that both wings in Judaism have points of contact with the past. But so had Christianity its starting-point in Judaism. Yet, whether we worship in synagogue or temple, whether we recite old prayers or newly fashioned, we are conscious of a bond of union which transcends the synagogue ritual. If the synagogue emphasizes distinctions, the lodge and, aye, the club bridges them over. God forbid that the synagogue should pass away from us. Nay, in the dispersion nothing it seems could take its place. But given a place where Jews might form the majority, and be it in Itoland, it is conceivable that some other institution might succeed to the synagogue, is perhaps already preparing to succeed it. The synagogue was primarily the creation of the dispersion. Nevertheless, all of this is idle occupation. We must look at things as they are now, albeit the hereafter shapes itself in the now. Suffice it to say that, while in no way minimizing the importance of the synagogue, there are at present already other and perhaps more potent agencies in uniting Jew to Jew. And with this passing of the influence of the synagogue as a uniter of Jews there is connected another change. The parnas and the rabbi command but local adhesion. Their rule extends over the autonomous synagogue. Our communal life is much disorganized. Nevertheless it is worthy of note that in our communities the guiding spirits are no longer our ministers, but laymen. Of late the laymen have also shown a tendency to go apart. Rival organizations of laymen are combating each other in a bitter ruthless manner. Rival leaders surround themselves with rival constituencies. Naturally there are principles at stake. The principles it would seem are pretty much the same that divide the synagogues. Yet there has been an alignment of forces running across the customary boundary lines, and East and West have grasped hands to crush the common foe. Often the principles are obscured, and the fight has the more ignoble appearance of a scramble for leadership. Sometimes it would appear as if the classes and the masses stand opposed to each other. Of course, there is much interlapping. And the masses have always chosen their leaders from among the classes. Shall we say that there is an instinct in the common people which knows its will and must have its way? The war has been a disrupter, but it has also acted to unite a nation within. When the common danger is imminent, men will bury the hatchet. Shall we say that Israel is an exception? We cannot give assent to the proposition. A permanent division in times of stress would spell our ruin. And we are not quite ready to disband. As certain as it is that there are Jewish problems awaiting a solution, so certain it is that the people will rise and brush aside cobwebs theological or of any other description. The woes of Israel must come to an end, and for that we require a united front. Neither diversity of ritual nor differences of a lay kind will be suffered to obstruct the path to the safety of Israel among the nations and in the world. We share not the misgivings of many in the ability of the Jew to extricate himself out of the meshes of internecine strife. Peace must reign in our camps, and all quarrels must be composed, long before the world peace will come. For in order that our rights may be recognized by the world abroad, we must present a solid and united front. The unity of Israel stands unbroken. It is the guarantee of Israel's existence. We will to live, and, therefore, must will to be one.

THE SECOND LIBERTY LOAN

One hundred and forty years of American history of painful struggles and uncomplaining hardships with which our national ideals were created, defended and maintained, call upon us for help lest our civilization perish from the earth.

That the world may be made safe for Democracy, it is not enough that we declare war. We will not survive autocracy and militarism merely because our boys, with an undaunted spirit, are leaping up in legions to go to France. We cannot feel that the enemy's submarine campaign will fail because we are undertaking to build a magnificent merchant marine.

Planning is one thing—execution is another. We are standing upon a dangerous precipice. We will fall to failure, our ships will not be built, our Army will not be adequately equipped and supported, if we, who remain behind, fail in our duty. Every loyal American must draw to the fullest extent upon his resources to furnish to our Government sufficient means for the prosecution of a successful war.

Not only as an investment in the primest security in the world, but as a matter of self preservation as well, we must buy—and buy again and again—these bonds with as deep and exultant a joy as is exhibited by those who go marching off to the training camps.

THE FEDERATION IDEA IN SYNAGOGS.

The meeting held at the Standard Club for the purpose of organizing a Federation of Synagogs in Chicago—a full report of which appears elsewhere in this paper—is of the utmost significance in the life of American Jewry. It is true of all the big cities of the land, as it is of Chicago, that most of the congregations came into existence independently of each other. Interested first, last, and all the time, in their own financial status, membership roll, and Synagog and school attendance, they not infrequently became rival concerns. Allowing for exceptions, it is unfortunately true that, in cities where two or more congregations exist, the relation between them hardly reflects credit upon the sacred cause for which they stand. The attendant evils of a house divided paralyze all such efforts as should be sponsored by the entire community rather than by any one of the congregations. The maintenance of chaplains to minister to our unfortunate brothers in the penal institutions, the upkeep of Normal Schools for the preparation of our religious school teachers, the education of all Jewish children in our faith and history, and the increase of congregational affiliation, are but a few of the duties for which each community, as a whole, is responsible. In the philanthropic field, the idea of Federation has borne excellent fruit. Instead of dozens of struggling charitable institutions working at cross purposes, we now have, in a great many of our large cities, Associated or Federated Charities, which, while allowing the constituent bodies full autonomy, are of great help to all of them, by coordinating and guiding their activities. Chicago has made the first attempt in America to apply the Federation idea to the Synagogs, to supplant the spirit of congregational rivalry by the spirit of harmony and cooperation. The proposed Federation of Synagogs will, in no way, infringe upon the rights of self-government of the congregations; nor will it interfere with their freedom to determine on what days and in what manner public worship shall be conducted. Neither will it attempt to curb the free word in the various pulpits. Its main object will be to do away with the anarchy and chaos in our religious life. It will remove the irreligious spirit which now and then appears in our congregational life, and will tend to create a kindlier feeling among the members of the various synagogs. It will remove all needles duplications of effort, and all waste of means and energy, on the part of the congregations. It will also look after all those communal Jewish interests which no congregation can care for separately. Chicago's experiment will be watched with interest throughout the country. May God cause this work to prosper!

CLEVELAND SCHOOL HEAD OPPOSES SECTARIANISM.

Does not favor "Merchant of Venice".

Sectarian religious teaching in public schools does not meet with the approval of Dr. Edward E. Spaulding, Cleveland's new superintendent of schools.

In an interview with the representative of the Jewish Independent, Dr. Spaulding declared that it is his belief that sectarian religious teaching in the schools is neither practical nor wise, but added that it is not his purpose to take up the general subject at this time as the issue has not been raised.

On the subject of "The Merchant of Venice" in English literature classes of the high schools of Minneapolis, Dr. Spaulding issued an order prohibiting the use of this play in high school classes. He expressed himself on this matter in the recent interview as follows: "We have plenty of English literature that is just as good as 'The Merchant of Venice' and I believe we should study literature that is not offensive to any pupils".

ANTI-JEWISH RIOTS IN TUNIS.

For some time past, certain newspapers published in Tunis have incited the people against the Jews. These maneuvers have had a disastrous effect. On the 19th of last month a number of soldiers passed through the streets of the Jewish quarter, uttering hostile cries as they went along. Seeing that the police did not interfere, they returned the following day and started a regular pogrom, in the course of which five Jews were injured. Shops were pillaged, their fixtures were smashed, and the goods were either thrown on the ground or carried away. During these scenes a number of ragamuffins shouted: "Death to the Jews". The authorities restored order, but only tardily, and several arrests were made.

SAD CONDITIONS IN LITHUANIA AND POLAND.

Another heartrending account of the condition of the inhabitants of Wilna has reached Petrograd. In the suburbs of Wilna, it states, there is hardly a house without a person seriously ill. Typhus is raging. The mortality among the children is appalling. Respectable people beg for bread in the streets. Flour, potatoes, or barley are not to be obtained in the town. Sixty per cent of the people subsist on charity, but unfortunately many soup kitchens are now suspending their activities on account of the lack of food. At Siedlece, the order instructing all Jews to cut their beards, "on sanitary grounds", has been suspended.

The Warsaw Jewish Agricultural Society, the Jewish Society in Aid of Children, the Jewish Society supporting the Artisans' School, and the Organization "Daath", have received a permit to organize a lottery for one million roubles.

Contributions to the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League will be published in the November issue of the News.

AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS POSTPONED.

The American Jewish Congress was postponed from November 18 until the time when peace negotiations will be in sight, by action of the executive committee of 140, at a meeting last Sunday afternoon, October 14, at Temple Emanu-El.

About fifty members of the committee were present. Those not present, however, were granted the opportunity of voting by mail, and the vote on the question was seventy-three in favor of postponement and thirty-one against.

Mr. Nathan Straus, the chairman of the executive committee, had presented the resolution for postponement at the meeting of the administrative committee, which was held Thursday, October 4. The motion, however, lacked the necessary two-thirds vote and was defeated. But it was then decided to refer the question to the full executive committee for final decision.

The advisability of postponement was strongly urged by Mr. Nathan Straus, Hon. Henry Morgenthau, Mr. Louis Marshall, Dr. Stephen S. Wise, and Dr. Samuel Schulman. It was their opinion that it would not be proper at this time to convene a Jewish Congress and to put forth Jewish claims, when the American people of which the Jews in this country form a component part, are engaged in a war. It was the business of the Jewish people at this time to concentrate their entire attention along with the rest of the American people upon the successful prosecution of the war.

On the other hand, it was argued by Mr. Louis Lipsky, Dr. N. Syrkin and Mr. Joel Enteen and others that the Congress speaking in behalf of entire American Jewry would be a means of giving expression to the loyalty of the Jewish people of this country to the Government, and of allaying any suspicions against the Jews, brought about by the disloyal expressions on the part of some Jews. It was also the opinion of the opponents of the postponement that since the President had delegated men to the task of compiling data and to prepare memorandums upon which the American Government would make peace, the Jewish Congress should be held now, in order to supply the commissioners with information on the Jewish question and the claims of the Jewish people as coming direct from a body representative of the entire Jewish people of America.

The postponement of the Congress from November 18 does not mean any abatement in the work for the Congress. It lies in the power of the administrative committee to fix the date for the holding of the Congress, and the chairman, Colonel Harry Cutler, will call a meeting of the committee at any time any of the members so request. A statement on the action of this meeting will be sent to all delegates.

Meanwhile all contests and unfinished matter in connection with the elected delegates will be finished up, so that the delegates might be ready to come together at any time they are summoned. The reports and memoranda of the various commissions will be completed and circulated. The memoranda on Galicia, Roumania and the Balkan States and Salonica, have already been completed. The report on the Jewish condition in Poland is being prepared by Mr. Nahum Sokolow, the noted scholar and journalist, who is now in London. His report will soon be in the hands of the committee. The memorandum on Russia is being prepared by the chairman of the commission on Russia. Mr. Herman Bernstein, who has recently returned from a visit to that country and has collected important data which he will use in his report. The Commission on Economic Reconstruction, of which Mr. Louis Marshall is chairman, will prepare the memorandum suggesting plans for reconstructing the Jewish communities in the war zones.

RUSSIAN JEWS AND THE RUMANIAN GOVERNMENT.

After explaining the difficulties presenting themselves in regard to the selection of Kherson as the place of sojourn of the Rumanian Court and Government, which appear to be due to the action of the local committee of the Soviet, the Times correspondent in the Balkan Peninsula says: The Jewish revolutionary organizations at Kherson also manifest energetic hostility to the presence of the King and his Government, which, they declare, may be productive of untoward consequences in view of the anti-Semitic policy hitherto pursued in Rumania. It is more than probable, adds the correspondent, that "a more hospitable attitude" may be adopted and Kherson placed at the disposal of the Rumanian Government.

PRESIDENT WILSON SETS OCT. 24 AS LIBERTY DAY.

Washington, Oct. 14.—The President today issued the following proclamation:

"The second liberty loan gives the people of the United States another opportunity to lend their funds to this Government to sustain their country at war. The might of the United States is being mobilized and organized to strike a mortal blow at autocracy in defense of outraged American rights and of the cause of liberty. Billions of dollars are required to arm, feed, and clothe the brave men who are going forth to fight our country's battle and to assist the nations with whom we are making common cause against a common foe.

Asks for Demonstrations.

"To subscribe to the liberty loan is to perform a patriotic service.

"Now, therefore I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, do appoint Wednesday, the 24th of October, as Liberty Day, and urge and advise the people to assemble in their respective communities and to pledge to one another and to the Government that represents them the fullest measure of financial support.

"On the afternoon of that day I request that patriotic meetings be held in every city, town and hamlet throughout the land, under the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury and the immediate direction of the liberty loan committees which have been organized by the federal reserve banks.

Impress the Kaiser.

"The people responded nobly to the call of the first Liberty loan with an oversubscription of more than 50 per cent. Let the response to the second loan be even greater and let the amount be so large that it will serve as an assurance of unequaled support to hearten the men who are to face the fire of battle for us. Let the result be so impressive and emphatic that it will echo through the empire of our enemy as an index of what America intends to do to bring this war to a victorious conclusion.

"For the purpose of participating in Liberty Day celebrations, all employes of the federal government throughout the country whose services can be spared may be excused at 12 o'clock, Wednesday, October 24".

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

"Done in the District of Columbia, the 12th day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and seventeen, and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and forty-second. (Signed)

"WOODROW WILSON,
"President.
"ROBERT LANSING,
"Secretary of State".

DISTRICT NO. 1 PRESENTS AMBULANCE TO AMERICAN RED CROSS.

District No. 1 has presented an ambulance to the American Red Cross Society for service in Europe. It is expected that several more ambulances will be presented by the District to the American Red Cross Society. The committee in charge of the purchase of the ambulance consists of Bros. Jos. Rosenzweig, the President of the District; Chas. Hartman, member of the Executive Committee, and Wm. Asher, the originator of the ambulance fund idea. The plates for the ambulance have been furnished by Bro. A. M. Friedman of Horeb Lodge. It is reported that Horeb Lodge, in addition to the liberal contributions already made by the various members of that lodge towards the ambulance fund, contemplates presenting an ambulance to the District for the use of the American Red Cross Society.

District No. 1 received a very appreciative letter from the American Red Cross Society. After acknowledging receipt of the check for the ambulance, the letter reads as follows:

"We will notify Washington of your generous gift and can assure you that your ambulance will be included in the first contingent to go forward.

"The generous offerings are great, but necessity seems always in advance of our power to relieve it. It is with very great appreciation that in the name of those to whom it will mean so much, I attempt to thank the generous members of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith for this timely gift. Your ambulance will soon be doing its share toward the relief of those who, as the winter approaches, will need even more than now whatever alleviation lies in our power to give.

"Again I beg to thank you for this concrete expression of your sympathy.

"Yours very truly,
"S. B. BOSWORTH,
"For the American Red Cross".

TESTIMONIAL TO THE HON. ABRAM I. ELKUS.

A testimonial dinner was tendered by the members of the Board of Directors of the Jewish Chautauqua Society and their ladies to the Hon. Abram I. Elkus and his wife. The dinner was held at the Mercantile Club, Philadelphia, on the evening of Sept. 20, 1917. The occasion was the first meeting, since Mr. Elkus' return to America, of the Board of Directors of the Society of which he is president. The occasion was informal and of a most delightful character. Great regret was felt at the inability of Mrs. Elkus to be present.

Towards the close of the dinner the vice-president of the Society, Mr. Oscar Loeb, of Philadelphia, in a genial manner and with some appropriate remarks, called upon Rev. Dr. Henry Berkowitz, chancellor of the society, to convey to the guest the sentiments of the Board. Dr. Berkowitz extended a hearty welcome to Mr. Elkus in behalf of the Board of Directors and the members of the Society at large. His absence at the last Assembly at New Orleans had been much deplored, and the lack of his guidance had been keenly felt. An account of the stewardship of the work of the Organization, he said, would be placed before their guest. They had learned with deep pride of the honors to which Mr. Elkus had been called and of the marked distinction with which he had served the United States Government as Minister to Turkey. Their prayers and good wishes attended him on his departure, even as now their sentiments of congratulations and hearty good cheer welcome him on his return. During that interval, one of the most notable chapters in history had been recorded. Therein the name of the Hon. Abram I. Elkus finds a distinguished place.

Along with all of his countrymen and more especially the members of the Jewish faith, his hosts had followed Mr. Elkus' activities abroad. Called to serve as Minister of the United States, he found himself under the necessity of filling the places of ten ambassadors in Constantinople. The large staff under his personal direction required his constant attention seven days in the week, and at all hours of the day and night. The welfare of thousands of prisoners and of interned foreigners were in his hands. Nevertheless, both he and his wife found time to devote themselvs to notable works of charity, and the establishment of relief measures. Indeed, it was in the fulfillment of these tasks that Mr. Elkus had broken down in health and suffered a dangerous illness.

We are most happy to have him in our midst once more, restored to good health, and grateful for the lustre he has shed upon our people. As president of the Jewish Chautauqua Society, he had led this organization in winning the co-operation of all elements of American Jewry. In a similar spirit he had brought about for the first time a genuine co-operation between the Sephardic and Ashkenazic elements in Constantinople.

Mr. Elkus responded heartily to the toast with which Dr. Berkowitz concluded. He gave a most interesting account of his wonderful experiences. The stories which he told so vividly, at times were so pathetic and harrowing that his hearers were profoundly moved. He said he had learned in his trip abroad far more than would be possible to learn from books. He had come in contact with many peoples and traveled in Turkey, the Balkan countries, Austria, Germany, France and England. He had met with the leaders in these countries. Mr. Elkus spoke in glowing terms of the French soldiers and the French women who regard the Americans as the saviors of their country. He was deeply impressed with the fact that "all Israelites are brothers" and the bonds of fraternity which unite them, though widely scattered and different in exterior appearances and customs, are whole-hearted and genuine. Many interesting questions were responded to by the speaker.

Afterwards there was a brief business meeting over which Mr. Elkus presided. It was decided, owing to the present unrest and the overcrowded conditions at the Capitol in Washington, that the Society should defer the Assembly scheduled to be held in that city next December. It was also decided to affiliate with the National Board for the welfare work among the Jewish soldiers and sailors. A report of the admirable work done last summer in the University Extension Department was received and various recommendations for the extension of this work favorably received.

U. S. FOOD ADMINISTRATION

THE FOOD ADMINISTRATION AS A MORAL FORCE.

By Howard B. Grose, D. D.

From the point of view of morals and religion the United States Food Administration is a new thing in our government. It is calling out the sacrificial spirit in the religious bodies of the country and the highest moral qualities in business men by its direct appeal to patriotic service. What holds out finer promise for the future conduct of commerce, for example, than such action as was taken by the Eastern Canned Goods Commission representatives, after their conference with the Food Administrator and his associates? They pledged themselves specifically not to engage in speculation in food products of any kind; to decline to buy or sell for any customer purchasing beyond his normal needs; not to hoard food products; and to load cars to their fullest capacity and urge their customers to do the same. They asked that the Food Administration license all commission merchants and others dealing in staple foods, including the more important canned goods, for the protection of the men who are observing the regulations and of the public. More than that, the commission houses represented agreed to work together for the protection of legitimate business and of the Government in its purchase of supplies, to report anyone who in their judgment is evading the Food Law, and not to offer any futures of the packing of 1918 without further conference before Jan. 1.

This action is given thus fully because of its significance, and because it is representative of similar action by other commercial organizations which have large influence and outreach. Take in connection with it the fact that the Packers' Committee, representing all classes of packers, after conference with the Food Administrator, approved of the Government's placing the entire industry under license and declared its desire to co-operate with the Food Administration in working out war problems. Realize that the great packers of the country, such as Armour & Company, Swift & Company, Morris & Company, and the Cudahys of Chicago and St. Louis, are included in this compact; that these men combined have power to prevent speculation, war profiteering and greed in the industry they represent. Nor have these leaders in vast enterprises been dragged or dragooned into this action. They have come to Washington at the invitation of the Food Administration as patriotic citizens ready to aid the Government in every possible way in the prosecution of a righteous war, and under the persuasive presentation of the food situation have assented to propositions that in ordinary times would have been regarded as chimerical.

This has happened time and time again, and is one of the marvels of this unprecedented movement. It means a kind of co-operation, inspired by the highest motives, that must tell upon the entire business life of the nation. When the wholesaler and manufacturer each pledges himself to help keep down the cost of living and stop profiteering, the retailer will have to take notice and govern himself accordingly, or else give an account to those above and to the public. Once let this new standard come to prevail, and it will be difficult to return to a power when the war is over. Thus the Food Administration is exerting today directly and indirectly a tremendous moral impact upon the business world.

Its impact upon the religious life of the nation is equally strong. It has placed a high estimate upon the religious organizations, has freely and fully recognized their indispensableness in enlisting the homes in this food conservation campaign, and has called upon them for a large and definite service. The results cannot fail to be as beneficial to the churches as to the commercial interests. When our people come to see that food conservation and national preservation are inseparably linked, the response of the religious and commercial forces will not be doubtful, no matter what sacrifice may be involved.

SOME THINGS THE FOOD ADMINISTRATION HAS DONE.

The question is often asked, "What is the Food Administration accomplishing"? Here in brief are some of the things that have already been done:

1. The religious denominations of the country have been brought into co-operative relations, and the leading bodies, including Protestants, Roman Catholics and Jews have representatives at headquarters in Washington who form a recognized group in the co-operative organizations' section, of which Dr. Vernon Kellogg is now the chief.

2. The religious press has been called into conference and co-operation and has a special representative on duty. The religious press will do its part.

3. The fraternal organizations have been enlisted in support of the Food Administration plans, and with the religious organizations furnish a remarkable reach into the homes of the land.

4. Conferences with representatives of commercial interests, such as canned goods commission men, the Packers' Committee, the Emergency War Council of the Master Bakers' Association, and the Rice Millers' Association, have lined up these important organizations with the Food Administration, removed misconceptions and established relations that promise much for the future.

5. The Executive Committee of the National Canned Food and Fruit Brokers Association, after a convention in Washington in which Mr. Hoover participated, endorsed the U. S. Food Administration, pledged co-operation, approved the plan to license brokers, and condemned as unpatriotic, speculation, hoarding or the dissemination of market information in any manner tending to encourage buying beyond legitimate requirements or creating a fictitious and inflated market. The food control law was also approved. Consider what it means for such an influential body to declare: "For the encouragement of production and the economical conservation and distribution of food free of all speculative features, we offer our services unreservedly and pledge our loyal support to the Food Administration".

6. The Food Administration's plans for enrolling all the men, women, and children of the country in a food conservation army are well under way. Even the school children are to be assigned definite places in the ranks. The new enrollment drive will begin Oct. 21, and will be under the direction of a committee of which Dr. R. L. Wilbur, chief of the conservation division, is chairman, and Ida M. Tarbell is a member. This drive is a continuation and broadening of the campaign that has been in progress for several months, and has brought in more than a million and a half pledge cards signed by housewives and heads of families, promising to practice food conservation in the homes. Probably another million have been signed but not yet sent to Washington by the State Organizations. The record is remarkable in view of the rapidity with which the start was made and the shortness of time allowed. The task is phenomenal, like the program.

7. The Food Administration has asked the churches and synagogues to supplement this by placing weekly report cards in every home represented in their constituencies, which number more than fifty millions of the population. Preparations are making for this distribution, the weekly reporting to begin with Sunday, Oct. 28, and continuing until Dec. 30.

This is by no means all that has been done—suggestive rather of far-reaching plans, all having in view the benefit of America and her allies and the winning of the war. As the plans develop and the facts are known, the people will congratulate themselves upon the inception of the Food Administration idea and the translation of that idea into a marvelous American actuality.

THE SELECTIVE DRAFT IN FOOD.

Everyone is familiar with the process by which men have been drafted for service in the war. The principle of universal liability to service for all who can be spared to go to the front has been accepted heartily, and before many months a million soldiers from America will be fighting the battles of democracy.

Now these soldiers must be fed, and food must be provided also for our allies, to eke out their shortened supplies.

Food is short in France, because Germany is cultivating a portion of the territory of France, and because those taking the place of farmers who are fighting are unable to maintain production at the former standard. England is short for the latter reason, and also because her usual supplies of grain from the vast fields of Australia and Argentina are now cut largely off. Italy is short because her men are fighting Austria.

In short Western Europe needs at least half a million bushels of wheat from this year's harvest. Where is it to come from?

There is only one place from which it can come—North America. It will not be easy to spare the grain, but we have no choice and we shall succeed. Go into the campaign of food conservation in the spirit in which the French general, Petain, carried through the heroic Verdun campaign. When the enemy was launching its first attack, the word came to the general from those who were directing the campaign, "They must not pass". The veteran general replied, "They shall not pass". The world knows something of the tremendous cost of keeping that pledge, but it has been kept; the enemy did not pass.

So the call comes to the loyal people of America to "Save the wheat". From all over the country the reply is coming, "The wheat shall be saved". The United States Food Administration is depending on each man, woman and child doing his or her part to make good its pledge.

Everybody is put on his honor as to the form and measure of the part he takes. But does anyone dare do less than he is asked to do in this vitally necessary work of co-operation with our enlisted men?

FOOD CONSERVATIONISMS.

The war emergency committee of the American Specialty Manufacturers' Association has pledged co-operation with the Food Administration. This means the enlistment of thousands of wholesale and retail merchants and their traveling salesmen in conservation activities. It means that practically every dealer in specialty package goods in the country will be brought into line with the new movement.

Realize that these specialty dealers control the greater part of the American output of such package goods as cereals, patent breakfast foods, baking powders, flavors, soaps, canned soups, grape juice and other articles sold in individual containers, and the wide outreach of this co-operation becomes evident. Such comprehensive plans were never before laid, or even dreamed of.

When you see displayed in the store window of each large merchant a signed card, showing his agreement to sell at fair prices, not to speculate or hoard or buy from speculators, and to sell goods in original packages when possible, etc., you will know that he has attended a conference of the Food Administration at Washington and got his portion of the patriotic conservation enthusiasm which radiates from headquarters.

The forty to fifty thousand salesmen of specialty goods, mobilized to distribute cards for retailers to hang in their stores, will render valuable service in the follow-up pledge-card membership campaign which begins Oct. 21, just as the churches will do the biggest piece of follow-up work by placing the weekly report pledge card in every family in church and congregation, and seeing to it that the reports are returned for the nine weeks fixed upon. Food Conservation is bringing the business and religious forces into the closest co-operation. The moral and religious phases constantly appear.

About 50 per cent of the sugar we consume is imported, and Cuban sugar is the dominating factor in fixing the price. Hence the Food Administration is negotiating with the Cuban government and planters to see if a satisfactory price cannot be agreed upon, one that will insure a fair price for our people.

Picture the wide reach of the Food Administration plans. An International Sugar Committee of five members has been formed to arrange for the distribution of the available sugar. Every lump less of sugar you eat will make it easier for us to get the sugar to those who need it most; but it is almost staggering to think of the task before us. We must get accustomed to thinking in world terms.

In Europe one's daily bread is portioned out by the police. Food conservation in this country now is designed to keep us from the bread ticket condition; also to add a little to the daily allowance of our allies.

Increasing the production of sugar is just as important as reducing the price to the consumer. At present there is not enough to go around.

The Food Administration is to stabilize, not to disturb conditions. It is a service which every man, woman and child may enter. That is the beauty of it. We can all do our bit for our country.

Herbert Hoover, Federal Food Administrator, makes the following announcement:

The week of Oct. 21 to 28 has been selected for a nation-wide campaign to complete the enrollment of our forces in conservation of our food supply.

The harvest is now in hand, and we can measure the world's food resources.

The available supplies this harvest year are less than last year; the demand upon us is greater than last year, and from the last harvest we exported more than we could really afford. We can only meet the call upon us next year by savings and by substitution of commodities which cannot be transported.

The allies are our first line of defense. They must be fed, and food will win the war. All Europe is on rations or restricted supplies. Only in our own country is each one permitted to judge for himself the duty he owes his country in food consumption, although the world depends upon us to guard and provide its food supply.

This is a duty of necessity, humanity and honor. As a free people we have elected to discharge this duty, not under autocratic decree but without other restraint than the guidance of individual conscience. On the success of this unprecedented adventure in democracy will largely stake the issue of the war.

We are asking every householder, every hotel, restaurant, and dealer in foodstuffs in the nation to become a member of the Food Administration for conservation, and to pledge themselves to follow, insofar as circumstances permit, the suggestions that will be offered from time to time as to measures of food savings.

For us there is no threat of privation. We wish only that our people should eat plenty, but wisely and without waste. Wisdom in eating is to make possible such adjustments in our food consumption, shipping and war necessities as will allow us to fulfill our duty in exports to our allies. By elimination of waste we serve ourselves economically and morally.

I therefore appeal to the churches and to the schools for their assistance in this crusade; to all the organizations for defense, local and national; to all the agencies, commercial, social and civic, that they join the Administration in this work for the fundamental safety of the Nation.

(Signed) HERBERT HOOVER.

JEWISH RELIEF WORKERS TO HOLD SPECIAL ASSEMBLY OCTOBER 28.

At a recent meeting of the Joint Distribution Committee, held Sept. 12, 1917, in New York City, the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That the Chairman call into conference at a Special Assembly, various war relief workers throughout the country, for the purpose of devising ways and means to reach the $10,000,000 goal set for 1917, such Special Assembly to be held in New York City during the month of October, the exact date to be fixed by the Executive Officers of the Joint Distribution Committee".

In pursuance of the above the various relief committees of the United States are requested to advise Albert Lucas, Secretary, 20 Exchange Place, New York, as quickly as possible of the names of two, or at most three representative members of their respective communities, who would attend the Special Assembly to be held in New York City on October 28, 1917.

The responsibility of administering this large amount, the largest ever contributed to one cause by the Jews of America, and the need for continuing the campaign for raising still further large sums being self-evident, it now becomes imperative for all those who thus far worked so successfully, to come together to plan for the future.

JEWS IN RUSSIAN ARMY.

The "Russki Invalid", the official organ of the Russian militia, recently published some interesting data regarding Jews in the Russian army. More than 60,000 Jews were decorated for heroism and about 26,000 were promoted to higher ranks in the army. All this happened when Russia was still ruled by the autocracy, which was not anxious to recognize merit in Jews, and still about ten per cent of all Jewish soldiers were found deserving of honors for bravery.

Message from the War Front

By Hon. Henry Morgenthau

Part of Mr. Morgenthau's address before the Free Synagogue, Oct. 7, 1917

The last time that I spoke to you, after having been abroad, I brought you a message on behalf of the Armenians and the Jews. I told you of the terrible suffering of those two peoples. I told you of the great atrocities that had been committed against the Armenians under my own observation. I felt then that it was my duty to arouse the community to a realization of what had happened. The Americans responded nobly, they have rendered great service.

This time I return with a different message. Up to the time that I went abroad I, too, had suffered from that great idea, which few of you quite understand, the camouflage that exists. A real camouflage is a screen, fifteen to twenty feet high, to which they fasten evergreens or bushes to prevent the enemy from observing, either from the heights he occupies or from the aeroplanes, what is going on. I have discovered that there is a great big camouflage between the two warring sets of nations so that neither set knows what is going on behind the screen on the other side. I appreciate that I was permitted to be on both sides of this camouflage, and I have come back here with a message to America.

Some one asked me only yesterday, "How will you crush militarism in Germany"? I want to tell you that if this war continues—and I believe it will—for some time, that that military spirit of Germany, those officers who have inherited it, who have been trained for decades in it, will pretty nearly all of them have been destroyed. They are fast disappearing.

Now, what are we as an American nation to do? We are to help those great nations that have fought this monster, but have been unable to destroy it. We are to equip ourselves. Now, we have heard so much about this country being the great melting pot of the world. We Jews arrogate to ourselves that we occupy this melting pot largely, that this melting pot is for us. That isn't what Zangwill means. Zangwill means that this is the melting pot of the world. They have come from everywhere as far back as in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, they have come to this country to find a place where they could practice their religion as they should and would like, where they could become a free self-governing nation.

And this melting pot has been at work for decades and centuries. What has become of it? We have got in that pot an amalgam. That amalgam has cooled off. It is a material of valuable substances, but as a cold amalgam it is useless except as a treasure. Now, we will have to heat it again, and the only thing that will heat it is patriotic fagots put under it. We must create a big patriotic fire. We must recognize that out of this pot—it has got to be made liquid—out of the fluid, we must create a great army, a great navy, a great aeroplane division. We have to provide hundreds of thousands of beds for the sick, we have got to create a city, you might say, a country where two and a half million people will have to be properly housed, fed and trained. Can you conceive the task? Can we go and create a city for two and a half million people within six months or a year? We have to send to France two to two and a half million men before we are through. Can you conceive the titanic nature of that task? It is almost as great as the Emperor's undertaking—but not as vicious.

Now, this task is something terrific. I wish you could see the tremendous preparations, the tremendous necessities, and what there is behind these English and French lines of battle. If we are to help these people—and we have to because it is for our own sake—we must have as soon as possible a million men at the front in fighting trim. To maintain a million men in the lines requires a million reserve men. To supply those million reserve men, you need to have a half million civilians. You will have to build docks in order that the big ships, that we now use for transports, can dock. We will have to build a railroad from the port where our docks are to be built to our headquarters. We will have to build stations where we will house supplies for six to eight months, because they have no place or other centers to feed and clothe and shoe and provide other necessities for two million additional men.

Now, there isn't any one in this audience that must not do his share, because these people out there are going to hold out, positively going to hold out, and one of the things that is going to enable them to hold out is that they are aware that this great young giant of the West is getting his army ready, is getting everything ready on a large scale, to come out there and take his place at their armies and help them defeat this monster that is threatening civilization the world over.

Now, I think it is a great task, it is an honorable task, and I think we ought to try and grasp the situation. America has not yet fully understood the situation. If you think of what you have been told in the last two years, you will be able to put together the evidence, you will see the things you have been told day by day. The trial is going on, witnesses are put upon the stand, every day newly discovered evidence is produced that this was a plot against the world, it was a desire for aggrandizement, it was a desire to create one master nation so that all the nations would be enslaved or subdued by this master power.

America must do its part. Of all the nations of the world which ought to do the largest share, it is our country. Just think of what poor Belgium did to delay this monster attempt to gobble up France, destroy Russia, go for England, and last for us. We owe Belgium a great deal.

I am not an alarmist. I am a German by birth, and I have loved Germany and I love the Germans today. And I tell you what our task is: Just as Alexander II freed the serfs of Russia and as Lincoln emanicpated the negro, we Americans, under the leadership of Woodrow Wilson, have to help our brothers out there to be freed from the thralldom of Hohenzollernism and Kaiserism and absolutism.

Roumania and the Jews

A commission of Roumanian Jews has arrived in this country and will appear in Washington on the day when the new Roumanian minister is to make his first appearance in the capital. The Commission of Roumanian Jews has a sad tale to relate to the American government and people—a tale of suffering and persecution, a tale of hunger and misery. The Roumanian Jewish Commission will tell the American government and American Jews that Roumania is today treating the Jews worse than ever; that they are more bitterly oppressed by the Bratiano regime than in days gone by and, that unless the American government interferes, there will be no end to this persecution. The American government has more than once indicated its disapproval of the policy of the Roumanian government with regard to the Jews and will not fail to do so again, thus bringing pressure to bear on Roumania to stop its policy of pogroms. America stands for the validity and holiness of international treaties; Roumania, though a belligerent on the side of the Allies, is continuing to violate the international treaty that gave her her place among the nations in a most shameful manner. The present Roumanian Prime Minister, Bratiano, is very successful in deceiving the Allies with regard to the Jews. While he keeps on promising a speedy emancipation of the Roumanian Jews, probably in order to prevent the intervention of the Allied governments in favor of our oppressed correligionists, he continues to persecute the Jews in an unheard-of way. Since the Russian soldiers in Roumania have freed Roumanian Socialist leaders from jail, the Roumanian government make the Jews feel the wrath and fury which it has against the Russian Socialist soldiers. It is because of this special persecution of Roumanian Jews that the situation has become unbearable. It seems that the new Russian regime, probably because it is not yet consolidated, has not influenced the Roumanian government in the least, so that the Roumanian Jews, in order to escape maltreatment and more savage oppression, must apply to the American government for help.

Another task of the Roumanian Jewish Commission is to enlighten the Jewish public in this country as to the economic position of the Roumanian Jews. Up till now, we have heard of a state of famine in the Roumanian Jewish ghetto. We do not know details. The Roumanian Jewish Commission will, for the first time, tell the tale of horror and ask help from American Jewry. Since there are now vast relief sums available, the Roumanian Jewish Commission should not have to plead long for help. Our friends from Roumania may rest assured that whatever American Jewry can do for our Brethren in Roumania in the way of relief will be done and done speedily.—American Jewish Chronicle.

Judge Brown Casts Aspersions Upon Jewish People

The Jewish Exponent of Philadelphia reports that on Thursday October 4th, 1917, just before court adjourned, Judge Brown called Lieutenant Bennett to the bar of the court and asked him whether his name was Bennett or Steinberg.

Attorney Connor interposed that as counsel for Bennett he advised him not to answer.

"Well, I want to know." demanded Judge Brown. "Did you have your name legally changed from Steinberg to Bennett, or is it Steinberg? If not I will direct that the bail for this defendant shall be entered in the name of Steinberg, alias Bennett, and that good bail in the sum of $10,000 shall be entered for him and for Mr. Deutsch so that the Commonwealth may be amply protected".

Bennett still remained mute under the direction of his counsel, noting wihch, Judge Brown continued:

"I can't understand why a man having a Hebrew name should change it to a name of some other nationality and bring reproach on that other nation. I am moved to say this because I have noted in my official career as a judge in this court and other branches of this court that I have been called upon frequently to sit in judgment in the cases of Hebrews, some of them of the very lowest type, who were charged with offenses no Irishman in God's world ever would be guilty of".

Intended no reflection on Jews, Judge. says.

Judge Brown, after the opening of the hearing on Friday morning, made the following explanation. His remarks, taken down stenographically, follow:

The Court: "Before we proceed with this case I desire to state publicly, lest the remarks of the Court last night before the adjournment be misconstrued, that I had no desire, no thought or any intent to cast a reflection upon a race of people who in themselves are the foundation of law and order in this country and have been all over the world all their lives. I have been all during my lifetime a student of the Bible. I have great respect for Moses and his laws. I have very many friends among the Jewish people. I would not for anything cast a reflection upon that people as a race. Every nationality has a low grade of people that they must contend with. It is unfortunate.

"I only wished to draw attention to the fact that many instances which have been brought to my attention while I was sitting in the Misdemeanants' Court where people of a distinct racial appearance have added the name of another people in order to ply a nefarious trade that ruins and saps the vitality of other people.

"I wish this to be as publicly stated as the other remarks of mine were. I am a believer in the Bible. I am a follower of Moses in the beginning and of Jesus Christ today."

Jewish Organization Takes Action.

A meeting of representatives of the various lodges of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith was called at the Hotel Majestic last Monday evening to determine what action, if any, shall be taken by the Jews of Philadelphia on the unwarranted reference by President Judge Charles L. Brown, of the Municipal Court, to Jews and crime. The meeting, however, was attended by representatives of the B'rith Sholom and many other Jewish organizations, and in consequence it was declared a meeting of representatives of all leading Jewish organizations of Philadelphia.

In order to avoid any political factional feeling, only those men were selected as representatives who were free to present their views, without bias or prejudice.

The meeting was calm and deliberate. Various views were expressed, but all were in condemnation of the utterances from the bench as provocative of race feeling and prejudice. The meeting finally resolved to take no further action than to announce a statement of principles based upon the fundamentals of American justice as the expression of the Jews of Philadelphia, and to give publicity to the statement.

Mr. David Bortin, vice president of the B'nai B'rith for this district, acted as presiding officer, and J. Solis Cohen, Jr., as secretary. The chairman appointed a Committe on Resolutions, composed of Messrs. Louis Edward Levy, Jacob Singer, Solomon C. Kraus, Bernard Harris and Louis Herbach.

Before the meeting adjourned the committee presented the statement [illegible] as the sense of the meeting, which was adopted unanimously.

As Jewish citizens of the Republic having deep concern for equal and exact justice to all men, and profoundly sensible that the blessings of liberty and the Constitutional guarantees of freedom of conscience and religious toleration are largely dependent upon the due administration of public justice in the courts of the land by a learned judiciary, deeply imbued with American abhorrence of all discriminations on account of race, nationality or creed, we strongly condemn the introduction into judicial proceedings of any characterization of parties or witnesses based upon their adherence to any religious faith or reflection upon their nationality or that of their forefathers.

Except in the rare instance where the religious convictions or nationality of an individual might be a direct legal issue in a judicial proceeding, and evidence of same be duly offered and admitted, any remarks, comment, criticism or praise of and upon the religion or nationality of any person before the court, or innuendo, directly or indirectly, detracting or lauding the religion, race or nationality to which such person may belong or be descended from are not alone unjudicial, unwise and narrow, but wholly un-American as provocative of race and religious hatreds and nationalistic antagonisms dangerous to our internal peace and security as well as legally inadmissible, against the spirit of our Constitution, subversive of the plainest tenets of natural justice, and destructive of the sacred foundations of freedom upon which our liberty-seeking ancestors builded our judicial system, the preservation of which depends upon the degree of confidence which its administration engenders in the body of the people.

When such statements, gratuitously made by a judge during a trial in court, and especially while our Nation is at war to uphold human rights and make the world safe for democracy, can have the effect of arousing the resentment of an entire religious group in the community they should be denounced and condemned in terms no less severe than all other un-American and unpatriotic statements or doctrines dangerous to our national life, and thereby giving aid and comfort to the enemy.

Apologies or explanations by a Court from whose mind or heart it was possible that such remarks or comments could emanate rarely, if ever, can destroy the infectious seed sown; they more generally add insult to the injury and leave somewhere unnecessary pain and sorrow, and elsewhere a germinating growth poisonous to the Nation's welfare.

We, Jewish citizens of Philadelphia, deem it opportune at this time to adopt the above statement and to make the pledge to continue to pursue the American concept of justice and to combat as enemies of the Republic no less dangerous than those with whom we are at war such within our land who would enkindle the deadly fire of intolerance.

SAME LAW FOR ALL.

Nothing could be plainer than the phraseology of Section IV, Article 1, of the State Constitution, which reads: "No religious test shall be required as a qualification for any office or public trust." Nothing is more evident to those who wish to investigate than the fact that this provision of the organic law of the State is being violated ruthlessly by school boards in a good many localities. Girls are being graduated from public schools and then go to normal school, who cannot, to save their very lives, get teaching places in their home towns because their religious faith happens to be different from that of the members of the local boards of education.

It is gratifying to see the State Department of Education taking a vigorous stand with the board of Medford township, in Burlington county, where a particularly aggravated case has come to light. To an estimable young woman of Stirling an offer of a position was formally made "providing you are not a a Catholic or a Jewess". This was a gratuitous insult, not alone to the young woman, but to those generally of either these faiths. The defense, so far as a defense has been made of the local board, is that it represented a finicky constituency and therefore put itself above the law.—Newark (N.J.) News.

THE AMERICAN SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' WELFARE LEAGUE OF THE INDEPENDENT ORDER OF B'NAI B'RITH

With the progress of the War it is becoming more and more apparent that the soldier work, which has been undertaken by the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League of the B'nai B'rith and the Jewish Welfare Board of New York is becoming more and more important. The cantonments are gradually being filled up. Among these are a great many Jews. When the cantonments for the National Army and the National Guard shall have been filled there will be between fifty and sixty thousand Jewish boys trained to take up arms for Uncle Sam. The most serious question to be dealt with with regard to these men is that of taking proper care of the boys while they are on leave of absence or on furloughs.

Observers of the war in Europe report that both England and France failed to take the precaution of providing recreation facilities for the soldiers while they were on furloughs, and as a result the military discipline was impaired when these men have been on the outside of the camp, and the efficiency of the soldier has, of course, thereby been greatly reduced. In order to avoid this pitfall the Executive Committee of the B'nai B'rith decided upon this welfare service without the camp, feeling that the military discipline was sufficient to maintain a high standard of efficiency within the camp. The principle that the morale of the soldier must be maintained without the camp, and that such amusements must be provided for him as will help to maintain it, has been confirmed time and again by officers of the United States Army; one of them expressed himself that he was very happy to find that agencies were at work looking after soldiers' social and spiritual welfare while they are on leaves of absence. His sentiment was something like this: "You keep the Jewish boys 'right' outside of the camp and we will take care of them properly inside of the camp". Of course, he did not mean to differentiate between the Jewish boys and non-Jewish boys. Jewish agencies were discussed, and that is why he singled out Jewish men.

Six cantonments have been officially visited and a number of men were interviewed. The large majority of them feel that there ought to be some kind of care for them when outside of the camp. There are a few who prefer not to be known as Jews, and who resent the efforts of any Jewish agency, religious or social, to render them any service, but the officers who have been interviewed have nearly in every case pledged their co-operation with our efforts in establishing headquarters in the city near to which the camp is located, at which the Jewish boys will have a home while on leave of absence.

Proceeding on the theory that there are too few Jewish soldiers in each regiment to justify the erection of a regimental "shack," and that the camp distances are too great to make a headquarters "shack" easily accessible to all men in the camp, the Managing Board of the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League has entered upon a policy of renting suitable buildings in the cities near each cantonment, equipping them with facilities for recreation, amusement and writing, and engaging the services of a trained social worker for each place, whose duty it shall be to place himself in close contact with the soldiers and with the Jewish communities in those cities. A number of such headquarters have been established and workers installed.

Camp Dodge, Iowa.

Camp Dodge is located near Des Moines, Iowa, a flourishing city with a very active Jewish community. Mr. Joseph Woolf, our worker there, reports that the community threw its homes open to the Jewish soldiers for the Holidays, and that the local houses of worship accommodated a large number of soldiers. The headquarters at 717 Grand St., have been equipped as first-class recreation and club rooms, with pool tables, piano, Victrola, magazines, writing material, etc. There has been a fine response on the part of the soldiers, and our worker has received every assistance from the local committee. The camp office is in the Y. M. C. A. building, and the following are giving their assistance to Mr. Woolf: Headquarters Committee, Mr. Myer Rosenfeld; Women's Hospitality Committee, Miss Jennie Yonker; Finance, Mr. R. Marks; Religious, Mr. Charles Silverman; Entertainment, Mr. Milton Goldman; Emergency Relief, Rabbis Manheimer Cohen and Zeichick. The chairman of the Executive Committee is Mr. Meyer Silverman, and Mr. Robert Lappen is secretary. The Rabbis have lent every assistance to Mr. Woolf, and as usual, are ministering to the spiritual wants of the men in uniform.

Camp Custer, Battle Creek, Mich.

Mr. Edgar J. Drachman, our social worker at Camp Custer, reports that he conducted services for the Jewish boys both at the camp and in the city, and that he had a very fine attendance. A number of the Kalamazoo people came out to the camp in automobiles and took some fifty men with them to Kalamazoo, where provisions had been made for entertaining them over the Holidays. Mr. Drachman also reports that he has received a great deal of encouragement from both the Jews and non-Jews of Battle Creek. There is a fine spirit of co-operation between the communities of Battle Creek and Kalamazoo, and the soldiers. The whole State of Michigan is interested in Camp Custer, and the different communities are exerting every effort to give the Jewish boys of the camp the most excellent service. Mr. Sam Folz of Kalamazoo, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Michigan Branch of the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League, Mr. Selig Stern, secretary, Mr. J. Miller, vice-president, and Mr. August Kapp, treasurer, are exerting every effort to extend to the boys at the camp every consideration possible.

Camp Grant, Rockford, Ill.

Mr. L. Edward Lashman, National Social Service Director of the I. O. B. B., has put himself into communication with many Jewish organizations of Chicago, with a view of arranging entertainments for the Jewish boys at Rockford. The local committee of the Rockford Branch of the League has been fortunate in securing most suitable accommodations at Rockford for this soldier work. Mr. Leon L. Lewis, head of Sinai Social Center, of Chicago, has promised that the Sinai Players will present to the soldiers at Rockford every play which they produce at Sinai Center, and the same arrangement is being made by Mr. Lashman with other organizations. These headquarters are also fitted up with writing facilities, pool tables, lounging and smoking rooms, and parlors for the ladies who assist the boys, and for visitors. The Council of Jewish Women of Chicago has interested itself in the Rockford Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League headquarters, and these are becoming the center for all Jewish activities of the city. On Rosh Hashonah evening the Hospitality Committee of the Branch tendered the Jewish men a dinner, at which 350 were present. The Northwest Fellowship Club of Chicago is arranging another dinner for all the men from their district in Chicago. Mr. David Gross is in temporary charge.

Camp Bowie, Ft. Worth, Texas.

Rabbi Charles Blumenthal, of the Ft. Worth Branch of the League has done most excellent work for the boys at Camp Bowie. Mr. Sol Wolfson, a social worker, has now been engaged to assist him, and they report that at the last reception tendered the boys, there were more than 100 present. These receptions are weekly occurrences. Recently, the young ladies of Ft. Worth organized The Girls' Assembly Club for the purpose of entertaining the Jewish soldiers. The two congregations of the city made it their business to take care of the men during the Holidays and a large number were present at services. The Hebrew Institute, a beautiful, new, four-story building, with a splendidly equipped gymnasium, dance hall and lounging rooms, has been thrown open to the soldiers. There is a fine library of both English and Yiddish literature, and every effort has been made to make the Institute a club of the highest type for the men. Rabbi Charles Blumenthal is chairman of the Ft. Worth Branch of the committee; Mr. Sol Wolfson, secretary; Mr. L. F. Shanblum, treasurer; Mr. U. M. Simon, head of the Finance Department; Mrs. Louis Mann, chairman of the General Women's Committee, and Mrs. U. M. Simon, chairman of the Entertainment Committee.

Camp Logan, Houston, Texas.

Houston is the home of the coming president of District No. 7, and of some of the leading members of the District, and they have been doing their utmost to render the greatest service to the Jewish boys. Mr. S. J. Westheimer, who is president of the Houston Branch, has been a tireless worker, as is Mr. Sol Schoenemann, Vice-President of District No. 7. The Y. M. H. A., the Concordia Club and the Jewish Literary Society have thrown their doors open to the soldiers, and a few days ago Mr. Bernard Freefield was sent down to assist the community as a representative of the League. A headquarters in the downtown section is now being secured and Mr. Freefield reports that he is receiving encouragement from all of those who are interested in this work. Captain Sam Slawitsky has been of great help to the workers in Houston because of his splendid co-operation.

Camp Beauregard, Alexandria, La.

The Alexandria Branch of the League opened a temporary quarters Sunday night after Succoth at the temple. There was a program of vocal and instrumental music, and Mr. Charles Jacobsen, Executive Secretary of the Alexandria War Recreation Board, spoke. The main headquarters of the Alexandria Branch will be opened in a few days in the W. O. W. Bldg. It will be fitted up as a first-class club house, with writing facilities, games, a piano, etc. The music at the opening of the downtown headquarters will be furnished by the First Louisiana Infantry Regiment Band and a general welcome to all the men in uniform will be extended. Dr. J. Rothstein and Rabbi Aaronson took charge of the spiritual welfare of the boys, while a committee, under the leadership of Mr. William Petersen and Mr. Wilfred Gehr attended to their social needs. Mr. Sam Blumenthal of Savannah, Ga., a professional social worker, has just been sent to Alexandria, and it is expected that with the co-operation of the above mentioned leaders in soldier welfare work, headquarters will soon be equipped and the boys at Alexandria will have social and recreational facilities.

Camp Shelby, Hattiesburg, Miss.

Mr. Sol London, who has charge of the headquarters at Hattiesburg, reports that there will be an opening of the League headquarters known as the "Jewish Community Hall for Soldiers' Welfare" on the 14th of October, and that Rabbis Brill of Meridian, and Moses of Mobile are to be there for the occasion. The work at Hattiesburg has brought the Jewish soldiers in contact with practically all of the Jewish citizens of that city and a great deal of credit for the success of this branch is due to Mr. Herman Katz, secretary of the League.

The following instructions have been issued to all of the workers at the headquarters, and these will be supplemented from time to time:

1. Get in touch with the local representative of the Fosdick Commission on Training Camp Activities as soon as possible, and work with him as much as you can.
2. Make the acquaintances of all the soldiers and let them know that you are there to help them in any way in which you can.
3. Get yourself thoroughly acquainted with the community. Ascertain what they are willing to do for the soldiers along the lines of entertainments, hospitality, etc., and make yourself a go-between, between the community and the men of the camp.
4. Get the names and addresses of the families of the soldiers. It would not be a bad idea if you could persuade your committee to let you drop a communication to these families, stating that you and the local committee are at all times at their command for anything they desire with regard to the welfare of the boys at the camp.
5. Keep a full record of all the Jewish boys of the camp; their army rank and their branch of service. Have this register where any Jewish person in the community can see it in case they want to look up some of these boys, or want to find out whether they have any acquaintances in the camp.
6. Keep in touch with the Y. M. C. A. at the camp. They will be of service to you and you can be of service to them. Our aim is to make it as pleasant for the boys as we can, not only through our own organization, but through any of the organizations that happen to be doing work in the camp.
7. Meet the commanding officers and be guided by their suggestions. They will make them if properly approached.
8. Report to this office at least once a month concerning all of your activities.
9. Assist your community if they need you, by acting as secretary of their committee if they so desire, and by helping them to raise funds for soldier work.
10. Engage as much as possible in personal service work for those of the soldiers' families who happen to visit them. Do this in connection with the Social Service Committee of the I. O. B. B.

The League is now working in full and complete co-operation with the Jewish Welfare Board of New York. Both organizations are under the direct supervision of an Administrative Council with Col. Harry Cutler, of Providence, R. I., as Chairman. The B'nai B'rith members are Messrs. Adolf Kraus, President of the Order, Joseph Rosenzweig, President of the District Grand Lodge No. 1, and Charles Hartman, member of the Executive Committee of the Order. The I. O. B. B. is now exerting every effort to make as large a collection of funds as possible for this soldier work. It realizes that the extent of the work depends upon the amount of money that can be raised. It is hoped that every member of the B'nai B'rith and every Jew will deem it his duty to contribute liberally toward this soldier service.

All funds can be sent to Mr. M. E. Greenebaum, 9 S. La Salle St., Chicago, who in turn will transmit them to Mr. S. S. Rosenstamm of New York, Treasurer of the Administrative Council of the joint organizations.

ANTI-JEWISH RIOTING IN MOSCOW.

As a result of a fire at the leather factory owned by M. Ginzburg, serious anti-Jewish rioting took place in a suburb of Moscow. The Black Hundreds spread rumors that the owners had themselves set fire to the factory, and a number of hooligans attacked the Ginzburg family and inflicted serious injuries on its members. The militia, which appeared on the scene, was also ill treated. The rioters then proceeded to search for stores of food in Jewish houses. The militia tried to protect the Jews, but though the search revealed no stores, the crowd became very threatening to the Jews and to their property. Mounted militia and leaders of the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' delegates were summoned, and assisted by a sudden downpour of rain, they dispersed the mob.

JEW AND GENTILE.

The very best way to induce a Hebrew to forget the middle wall of partition as much as possible and live and work as a patriotic Canadian citizen, is to meet him on the common platform of citizenship. An anti-Semite will tell us that the Jews is ungenerous, dishonest and grasping. Now any one who has been much among the Jews knows that many of them are exceedingly generous, and not only to their own people. We all acknowledge that we owe an incalculable debt to the great Jews of history; we may partly repay it by respecting the fine qualities of our Jewish neighbors and by showing in our brotherly actions toward them some of that superior enlightenment which we boast is our possession.—Montreal Herald.

THE RUSSO-JEWISH CONGRESS.

It is estimated that the cost of holding the Russo-Jewish Congress will amount to 500,000 roubles. A newspaper will be published during the sittings. Owing to the proposed duration of the proceedings, for a period of four to six weeks, provision is also made for the maintenance of the delegates in order that persons without means shall not be debarred from participating in the deliberations. It is intended to hold the Congress at Moscow or Petrograd, as near as possible to the period of the meeting of the constituent assembly.

GERMAN MAJORITY SOCIALISTS AS ANTI-SEMITES.

Die Internationale Correspondenz, the official publication of the German Majority Socialists, printed an attack on the Minority Socialists for having included two Jews among their five delegates who have visited Stockholm. The Leipziger Volkszeitung replied with a bitter complaint against the anti-Semitic outburst of the Majority organ and blamed it for fostering racial hatred.

JEWISH CONVERTS FORM A PARTY.

The first organization of its kind in history was recently formed in Petrograd of the Jewish converts who wish to be considered as members of the Jewish nation. About eighty members formed themselves into a party and formulated their platform, which includes an appeal to the Jewish people to recognize their claim to membership in the Jewish nation. The question was discussed by the Petrograd Jewish communal body. The Socialist members of the Council were in favor of granting the request of the converts and consider them members of the Jewish community.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

B'NAI B'RITH OF CHICAGO.

Oriental-Hillel Lodge.

On the evening of Oct. 3, 1917, at the Covenant Club Hall, Oriental-Hillel Lodge No. 72 held a well attended meeting. The guest of the evening was the president of the District, Brother Edward Sonnenschein.

A class of eight candidates was initiated and a number of applications for membership were presented. Brother Julius H. Mayer, past president of the District and director of intellectual advancement, presided.

A resolution was adopted by the lodge authorizing and directing the Board of Trustees to purchase a Liberty Bond in the sum of $1,000.

Brother President Sonnenschein delivered a forceful address on the duties of the hour. He emphasized the need of the members of the Order and the Jews in general, to demonstrate their patriotism and loyalty to the government whenever and wherever possible and he especially emphasized the necessity of looking after and caring for the various Jewish problems and needs.

Brother Julius H. Meyer addressed the lodge on the war situation. He emphasized the universal desire of establishing Jewish democracy throughout the world and in this manner abolish discrimination and prejudice between man and man.

The lodge resolved to request Judge Samuel Alschuler to preside at the next meeting of the lodge.

Ramah Lodge.

The quarterly meeting of Ramah Lodge No. 33 was held at the Covenant Club Hall on Sept. 10, 1917, in the presence of a large number of members and visiting brethren. A class of candidates numbering fifteen was initiated and in addition thereto a large number of applications for membership were presented and acted upon. The lodge resolved to exempt all such of its members as have entered the United States military and naval forces from the payment of dues during the term of service and for six months thereafter.

Officers for the ensuing term were installed by the president of the District, Brother Edward Sonnenschein. The special feature of the meeting was an address by Brother Sigmund Livingston, chairman of the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League, who in his talk outlined the aims and purposes of this new activity on the part of the B'nai B'rith and called upon the members to respond liberally to the appeal for funds wherewith to pursue this work. Supplementary appeals were made by Brothers Leon L. Lewis, L. Edward Lashman and J. Kraus of Rockford, Ill., a visiting brother, and as a result thereof, more than $200 was contributed by the members present.

The secretary reported that in response to appeal issued by the lodge to its members for voluntary contributions to aid the lodge in its charitable and philanthropic work, $240 was received. It was thereupon resolved by unanimous vote of the lodge to levy an assessment of $1.00 upon the members of the lodge to enable it to pursue its philanthropic and benevolent work.

The delegates to the last Convention of the District Grand Lodge presented their report, emphasizing the fact that as a result of the appeal made at the Convention for funds to aid Jewish war sufferers abroad, the delegates pledged that the lodge would contribute $1,000. Action of the delegates was concurred in and an appropriation for $1,000 for war relief purposes was made. A further appropriation of $500 for Soldiers' Welfare work was also ordered.

David Fish Lodge.

A special meeting of David Fish Lodge No. 130 was held at the Covenant Club Hall on Oct. 8, 1917. Special order of business was the consideration of a proposition whether the lodge should consolidate with some other lodge in the City of Chicago. After a thorough consideration and discussion of the subject matter, the lodge resolved to present to its members formal notice calling upon them to take final action upon the question of consolidation with Ramah Lodge No. 33 of Chicago.

Central B'nai B'rith Council.

The first meeting of the Central B'nai B'rith Council after the summer vacation was held at the Covenant Club Hall, on Sept. 17, 1917. A large number of members were present. Reports of the B'nai B'rith Free Employment Bureau for the months of July and August were presented, also special report of the superintendent, Brother O. G. Finkelstein. Brother L. Edward Lashman submitted report as to the operation of the B'nai B'rith Summer Camp for Boys, stating that during the months of July and August the committee jointly with a similar committee from the Young Men's Hebrew Association took care of about 90 boys at the camp at a cost to the B'nai B'rith of about $2,500. This cost naturally included the original cost of purchasing equipment and supplies. The committee recommended that the work of the Summer Camp be continued during the coming year and further recommended that a new site be chosen for the camp, more accessible and better located.

On the question of arranging literary and social evenings for the lodges, the Council went on record that owing to existing war conditions, no elaborate entertainments be arranged and that the annual banquet in honor of B'nai B'rith Day be also dispensed with and that the funds usually expended for such purposes be devoted to war relief and soldier welfare purposes.

MINNEAPOLIS LODGE, MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

The Lodge has had another successful and busy year. Owing to a growth of about sixty in membership it now has about two hundred and fifty members. It has held a large number of excellent educational meetings which have been well attended by lodge members and the public. Under its social service department work has been done along the line of the Big Brother movement, in helping to take care of juvenile delinquents, in providing literature and looking after the material welfare of Jewish inmates in the several state institutions. The Lodge was active in helping to pass the school bond issue in the hope of procuring a new school in the Lafayette District. It assisted generously the Newsboys' Club and numerous other institutions both local and general. During the session of the Minnesota Legislature it took an active interest in preventing legislation intended to legalize the reading of the Bible in the public schools and fostered other legislation, going even so far as to initiate legislation which it was believed would benefit the Jewish public. Signal service was rendered in a number of instances in preventing the showing of defamatory moving pictures. The usual committees were maintained whose object it was to watch vaudeville and burlesque shows for objectionable caricature of the Jew on the stage. Numerous concessions were obtained in the public schools through the agency of its committees in the way of eliminating practices objectionable to the Jewish children or parents. The lodge as a body donated about three hundred dollars to the War Relief fund. It is now engaged in collecting a fund for Jewish soldiers and sailors. It has encouraged both by its moral and financial support numerous other educational, philanthropic and charitable activities in the city and has maintained its established reputation as a radio-active center for good in the Jewish community.

DISTRICT GRAND LODGE NO. 1 WILL SEND AMBULANCE TO FRANCE

One ambulance will go at once with the first contingent of the Red Cross to sail for France, and others will soon follow as a result of the activities of District No. 1 of the Independent Order B'nai Berith. This district has, according to the announcement made by the secretary, Dr. Bernard M. Kaplan, raised a sufficiently large fund to make possible the sending across of this ambulance, which will be known as B'nai B'rith District No. 1. The committee in charge of these arrangements consists of the district president Joseph Rosenzweig, William Ascher and Charles Hartman.

Dr. Kaplan also announced that the finance committee has, through its chairman, William H. Silk, purchased $5,000 worth of the new issue of the Liberty Bonds, and that the individual lodges of District No. 1 have likewise invested $75,000 in Liberty Bonds.

By work one accustoms one's self to a severe and active life, and the character gains as much by it as the mind.—Ozanam.

B'NAI B'RITH OF CLEVELAND.

Arrangements have been completed whereby a First Aid Course to be given at the B'nai B'rith Building under the auspices and supervision of Cleveland Lodge No. 16 will be under the direction of the National Association in Washington.

The course will be similar to the ones offered at the various headquarters and at the end of the course certificates will be issued to those who have completed the term.

The month of September ushered in greater activities of the Speaker's Club of the B'nai B'rith. During the coming fall and winter months the club will meet weekly and an interesting program of debates and recitations is being arranged.

The Player's Club of the B'nai B'rith was engaged during the month of September in the reading of "Kindling," by Kenyon. This was the last play read in the fashion followed throughout the summer. Throughout the past summer the club has met weekly, at which meetings master plays by American and foreign authors were read and discussed.

As the result of a previous announcement of the organization of a basket-ball team of the B'nai B'rith, it looks as if it may be necessary to have more than one team. In fact, the Games Committee of the lodge is seriously considering the formation of a basketball league.

The interest displayed last fall in the junior B'nai B'rith oratorical contest and debates has prompted the committee to arrange for an intercity debate the early part of this fall.

To provide wholesome recreation for Jewish young men and women, the Dancing Committee of Cleveland Lodge is planning a course for the coming season. Miss Frances Livingston, who has met with much success in her work in that city, will have charge of the class. It is expected that part of the evening will be devoted to the instruction of the season's dances and will be followed by social dancing the rest of the evening.

The course will consist of twelve lessons and will begin on Oct. 24, 1917.

The Dancing Committee has further decided to organize a dancing class for the children of the members of the B'nai B'rith. The first session will be held on Oct. 22, 1917.

Cleveland Lodge is arranging for an entertainment on Sunday evening, Oct. 7, 1917. The committee in charge announces a slightly different entertainment and a very enjoyable time. The entertainment will be free to the members and their families. Dancing will follow the entertainment.

To celebrate their affiliation with the junior circle of the B'nai B'rith, the "Bontemps Club" gave an entertainment on Saturday, Sept. 27, 1917. The program consisted of a play, "The Man with two Countries," and there were other musical numbers.

JEWISH SERVICES AT OHIO PENITENTIARY.

Rabbi I. D. Jashenoski on behalf of the Social Service Committee of District Grand Lodge No. 2, conducted services on Sunday, Sept. 2, 1917, and the subject of his address was "The Law of Compensation". Mr. Kahr, sergeant-at-arms of the Ohio Senate, spoke on "The Wages of Sin". Another speaker was the vice-president of Zion Lodge No. 62, I. O. B. B., of Columbus, Ohio, and made a splendid talk on "Prejudice, Its Genesis and Exodus". After the services, cigars were distributed.

The following Sunday services were again held by Rabbi Jashenoski and he discussed "Life". At the close of his address he presented Rabbi Silverman of Brooklyn, the Jewish chaplain at Sing Sing, who spoke on "Prayer and Repentance As a Necessity Toward Right Living".

Appropriate services in celebration of Rosh Hashonah were held at the Ethics Hall. The morning service was conducted by one of the inmates, after which dinner was served by the B'nai B'rith, and cigars were passed around.

The afternoon service was conducted by Rabbi Jashenoski, who took for his subject "Blast from the Shofar". Miss Sarah Blasberg sang a solo and this was followed by an address by Warden P. Thomas, who took for his theme, "How to Face Life".

LINCOLN LODGE, PHILADELPHIA

A special meeting of Lincoln Lodge, pursuant to call of its President, Mr. David Phillips, was held on the evening of Sept. 20, 1917, at the Hotel Walton. It was well attended, and was visited by Joseph Salus of Atlantic City, N. J., Past President of District No. 3.

A number of very interesting addresses were made which aroused enthusiasm among those present, and a determination to do everything possible, as a Lodge and individuals, to look after the comforts and interests of all war conscripts, not only those who are members of Lincoln Lodge, but of all Jewish soldiers.

The President appointed a committee to secure from members of Lincoln Lodge any books and magazines that they might have, and which they could donate; or in lieu of such books or magazines, donations in cash for the purchase of same, to create a large collection to be sent to the soldiers stationed at Camp Hancock, Augusta, Georgia.

The President likewise appointed a committee to secure from the fellow-members of Lincoln Lodge any Victor or Columbia records that they might be in position to donate for the same purpose, or any cash contributions to purchase the same.

At the next meeting of Lincoln Lodge, which will be held on the first Thursday of October, at the Hotel Walton, the committees will make their reports, and it is anticipated that a great deal of work will be accomplished at that meeting.

OFFICIAL VISIT TO WINNIPEG LODGE, WINNIPEG, CANADA.

Brothers Hiram D. Frankel and Gustavus Loevinger of St. Paul, first vice-president and members of the General Committee respectively of the District Grand Lodge, paid an official visit to Winnipeg Lodge No. 650 of Winnipeg, Canada, on Sept. 8. The Grand Lodge officers were met by a number of the brethren of the lodge and were escorted to the Fort Gary Hotel. A conference of leaders of the lodge was held with the visitors and in the afternoon an executive meeting of the lodge took place. On Sunday morning a further conference with workers of the lodge was held and at noon an informal luncheon in honor of the visitors took place, at which short talks were delivered by prominent members of the lodge. In the afternoon the visitors were shown the various Jewish institutions, particularly those which are supported in part by Winnipeg Lodge. On Sunday evening a business meeting of the lodge was held, which was largely attended and at this meeting the Grand Lodge officers made addresses.

The Grand Lodge officers report that in their judgment they feel safe in saying that the conditions in the lodge are ripe for propaganda work being done and the standard and ideals of the Order are better cared for at the present time in the lodge than at any time since its organization. The meeting of the lodge on Sunday evening was most successful. The business was dispatched with rapidity and the debates were harmonious and interesting. The lodge has now 340 members and elected 16 new members at the recent meeting and 11 applications were presented.

HARMONY LODGE, BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

More than fifty members of Harmony Lodge No. 711 were present at the first meeting of the season at the new quarters of the lodge on Tuesday, Sept. 11, 1917.

Plans are being made by the lodge to dedicate its new club rooms next month when a number of well known men from all over the state will be invited to participate in the festivities.

Brother Charles H. Shapiro announced that prominent B'nai B'rith members will deliver addresses during the season in the newly established "Forum".

Resolutions endorsing the work of the Hebrew Citizens' Committee were presented and were unanimously adopted and a large donation by the society was made for the purpose of helping the Hebrew boys who will see service in the new American army.

The first number of the Harmony Record, a booklet dedicated for the advancement of Harmony Lodge, was distributed to the members and met with their favorable comment.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

ORGANIZATION OF NEW LODGES IN DISTRICT NO. 1.

President Rosenzweig's administration will be distinguished by the several new lodges which have been formed in District No. 1. One lodge was instituted at Liberty, N. Y., and bears the honored name of Maimonides, No. 809. The lodge was organized through the efforts of Bro. Moses Levin, of Mountaindale, N. Y., and the District Secretary, Bro. Dr. Bernard M. Kaplan. A lodge was also formed in Taunton, Mass., through the efforts of Bro. A. M. Hillman, of Worcester, Mass., a member of the General Committee, and Bro. Judge A. K. Cohen, of Boston, Past President of the District.

Another lodge was just formed by the District Secretary, Bro. Dr. Bernard M. Kaplan, at Bangor, Me. The President of the District, Bro. Jos. Rosenzweig, accompanied by Bro. Judge A. K. Cohen, of Boston, Bro. Hon. Samuel Campner, Mayor of New Haven, Bro. Dr. Elias Caplan, president of Israel Lodge, No. 796, of Portland, Me., and Bro. Hon. Jacob Berman, ex-District Attorney of Portland, will visit the Bangor community and institute the new lodge. The name of the new lodge will be Pine Tree, which is the nickname of the state of Maine. The charter members represent the best citizens of Bangor, men who are known for their interest in everything Jewish and in civic matters as well. It is safe to predict that the Bangor lodge will be a worthy sister of the other new lodge which was instituted about a year ago in Portland, Me., and which has already made a record for itself in B'nai B'rith annals of District No. 1, Israel Lodge, No. 796, having been instrumental in passing the Anti-Discrimination Bill by the State Legislature.

B'NAI B'RITH OF SAN FRANCISCO.

At least two social and recreational centers for Jewish soldiers and sailors are to be established in San Francisco, according to the plans of the Clubroom Committee of the Northern California Commission, Welfare Work in the Army and Navy.

Tentative plans for these centers—one in the B'nai B'rith Building and the other in the building of the Young Men's Hebrew Association, have just been announced by Harry K. Wolff, past grand president of District Grand Lodge No. 4, and chairman of the subcommittee on clubrooms of the central committee formed here a week ago through the aid of Rabbi L. S. Engelson to carry on welfare work among Jewish soldiers and sailors stationed in San Francisco and vicinity.

With Wolff on the clubrooms committee are Henry L. Mayer, Ira Kahn, I. J. Aschheim, Miss Ethel Feinaman and Mrs. Reuben R. Rinder.

While the plans of this committee so far are only tentative, it is proposed to equip the clubrooms in the B'nai B'rith and Y. M. H. A. buildings with reading and writing tables, periodicals and Jewish literature, writing materials, and games.

It is hinted that recreational centers in other parts of the city for Jewish men in uniform also may be maintained.

FAREWELL DINNER TO BRIDGEPORT JEWS DRAFTED FOR THE WAR.

On Sept. 13, 1917, a dinner was given in the Colonial Hall at Bridgeport, Conn., in farewell to Jewish lads drafted for the United States army.

Toastmaster was Attorney Lawrence S. Finkelstone and among those who spoke were the mayor of the city, Lieutenant-Governor of the state, Rabbi Wm. R. Wittenstein, Charles H. Shapiro and Rabbi Herbert S. Goldstein.

Mayor Wilson complimented the Jewish people on the patriotic demonstration and said that he believed that Bridgeport will be proud of the achievements of the Jewish lads in the National Army.

Mr. Chas. H. Shapiro as chairman for Connecticut of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League of the Order of B'nai B'rith, emphasized the work undertaken by the national organization. Bibles were presented to all the men by Rabbi Goldstein, who enjoined them to remember to keep the tenets of their faith.

Mr. Max Neisner, said to be the only surviving Jewish veteran of the war of the Rebellion, stirred the audience to a deep sense of patriotism with his address to the soldiers.

B'NAI B'RITH OF PORTLAND.

Mr. D. Solis Cohen, Grand Orator of District Grand Lodge No. 4, addressed the first meeting of the season of Theodor Herzel Lodge No. 314 on Tuesday evening, September 11, 1917 at the B'nai B'rith Building

A successful three day drive for members and funds for the B'nai B'rith Building was held during the week ending September 22, 1917, and was participated in by a dozen well organized committees with the net result of approximately $5000.00 in subscriptions for the current year.

A most enthusiastic meeting of Theodor Herzl Lodge No. 314, was held Tuesday night, at which the principal address was given by Dr. Jonah B. Wise. The necessity of aiding the Jewish soldiers and sailors was pointed out most vividly, with the result that it was determined to immediately increase the membership of the lodge in order that funds and support be secured for this movement. Short, snappy talks were also given by M. Mosessohn, Chas. W. Robison, Dr. Geo. Rubinstein and Grand President David N. Mossesohn. Immediately after the meeting a committee of 35 was organized for a whirlwind campaign for membership.

The largest attendance of the year marked the meeting of Oregon Auxiliary No. 2, Daughters of the Covenant, on Dct. 9, 1917, at B'nai B'rith Building. The features of the meeting were an address by Dr. Jonah B. Wise,, and the rendering of a solo by Miss Eloise Hall, accompanied on the piano by Mrs. Misha Pelz. Initiation of several candidates closed the meeting.

DENVER LODGE, DENVER, COLO.

At the meeting of Denver Lodge, No. 171, to be held on Oct. 14, 1917, Bro. George A. Levy, Past President of Ibn Gabirol Lodge, of Pittsburgh, present Chief of the Industrial Bureau, city and county of Denver, will address the lodge on "Efficiency—Personal and Business, or What Will the Harvest Be"? The address will no doubt prove unusually interesting and instructive.

With reference to the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League, the lodge at its last meeting pledged to this splendid work undertaken by the Order, $1,000.00, and voted to assess each member the sum of $2.00 for this purpose. Aside from this assessment it is expected that the members of the lodge will cheerfully contribute to the extent of their ability to a $10,000.00 fund the lodge expects to raise for the $1,000,000.00 fund required for this patriotic and worthy cause.

Brothers Herman J. Schwartz, William H. Goldberg and Simon J. Sheffran, for the Social Service Committee of the lodge, went to the State Penitentiary in Canon City on Rosh Hashono and conducted services for the Jewish prisoners in that institution. Brother Schwartz gave them a heart-to-heart talk. Among the 633 prisoners in the institution there are four Jews. One of these, through the efforts of the Social Service Committee, is to be paroled and the term of another expires in two months.

McKEESPORT LODGE, McKEESPORT, PA.

About thirty of the Jewish boys in McKeesport have gone with the army. The members of McKeesport Lodge signalized the occasion of their departure by giving the boys a send-off, at which more than five hundred people were present. Each one of the men was presented with a signet ring bearing the emblem of the Order, and a fountain pen.

The thirty soldiers were made members of the I. O. B. B. and their dues will be paid by the Lodge during their absence.

The whole community of McKeesport took a genuine pleasure in showing their appreciation of these boys' services for their country.

FRESNO, CALIFORNIA.

Under the auspices of Fresno Lodge No. 723, of Fresno, Cal., of which Brother L. M. Mendelson is president, arrangements were made for the proper observance of the high holidays. Dr. Louis G. Reynolds of Los Angeles conducted the services. The musical program was in charge of Mrs. Z. Blattenberger. More than three hundred coreligionists from different sections of the valley attended the services.

MISHAN LODGE, KALAMAZOO, MICH.

At a very enthusiastic meeting of Mishan Lodge No. 247, held in the vestry room of Temple B'nai Israel, Kalamazoo, Mich., on Sunday, Oct. 14, a class of thirteen candidates was initiated into the Order. Over forty members were present, besides visiting brethren from Three Rivers, Mich., Battle Creek, Mich., and Lansing, Mich., who motored to Kalamazoo in order to participate in the initiation.

Following the initiation of the candidates, the members of the lodge adjourned to the Temple where a meeting was called of the residents of Kalamazoo, the visiting brethren and their ladies. The meeting was addressed by the Hon. Samuel Folz, president of the Lodge, by L. Edward Lashman, director of the Social Service Bureau of the Order, and by Brother Edgar J. Drachman, in charge of the B'nai B'rith Soldier Welfare work at Camp Custer. After the meeting those present partook of a very delightful luncheon given in honor of the newly initiated candidates, the visiting brethren and their ladies.

VIRGINIA, MINN.

At an enthusiastic meeting of Mesaba Lodge, No. 673, of Virginia, Minn., held on Oct. 14, special action was taken by the lodge in the matter of furthering the Liberty Loan movement. The lodge subscribed for $200 worth of bonds and a committee was appointed to solicit among the Jewish residents of Eveleth and Virginia subscriptions for the bonds.

To secure contributions to further the work of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League, a further committee was appointed with Brother Max Lewis as chairman.

The question of joining in the movement of organizing a Central B'nai B'rith Council to represent the lodges of Chisholm, Duluth and Virginia was favorably considered. The secretary was directed to make the necessary arrangements with Brother Charles D. Oreckovsky of Duluth who has been delegated by the Grand Lodge to take charge of this matter.

The lodge has arranged for a social, which will be held on Oct. 28, and it is planned to have on the program a mock-court. A patriotic entertainment is being arranged for the succeeding month.

MONONGAHELA VALLEY LODGE.

On Sunday evening, Sept. 16, 1917, the officers and members of Monongahela Valley Lodge No. 778, of Monessen, Pa., tendered a farewell banquet to the members of the lodge who left for training, having been certified to the National Army. Over 100 members and friends were present.

Brother Max Janovitz acted as master of ceremonies. During the evening Mr. Fred Pete of Donora, Pa., entertained with several vocal selections and was accompanied at the piano by Miss E. Janovitz. Rabbi S. N. Neches delivered an address on the subject, "The Jewish Boys of the United States". Short talks were also given by Mr. Joseph Safier, president of the lodge, and Mr. A. Tanzer.

The Hebrew Ladies' Aid Society later served an elaborate dinner. The hall was decorated for the occasion with the national colors and emblems of the Order.

At the close of the evening the members of the lodge on their way to the training camp were presented with tokens of remembrance by the Ladies' Aid Society, Mrs. H. Lebowitz making the presentation talk and Mr. Feldman responding on behalf of the recipients.

MEMBERSHIP CAMPAIGN IN ARKANSAS.

Brother Louis Cohen, state chairman of the General Committee of District Grand Lodge No. 7 for Arkansas, announced to the lodges of that state that he will give a silver trophy to the lodge in Arkansas which shows the largest increase in membership from Oct. 1 to Dec. 31, 1917.

The basis of determining this increase will be on the present membership of the lodges and in this way all lodges will be on an equal footing.

TWIN CITY B'NAI B'RITH COUNCIL.

The first meeting of the year of the Twin City B'nai B'rith Council, composed of representatives of the Minneapolis and St. Paul lodges, was held on Sunday evening, Sept. 23, 1917, in Minneapolis. New officers of the Council were elected consisting of the following: President, Sylvan E. Hess; Vice-President, Jos. Shanfield; Secretary, Rabbi C. D. Matt.

The Council plans to co-ordinate as much as possible the work of the two lodges so that in such matters as soldiers' welfare and other matters of general importance there should be no duplication of efforts or conflict in the work of either lodge.

RIMMON LODGE, RICHMOND, VA.

THE CHICAGO FEDERATION OF SYNAGOGS.

A most successful meeting for the purpose of effecting a union between the local congregations was held at the Standard Club, on October 16, under the auspices of the Chicago Rabbinical Association. The following twelve congregations, ministered to by the members of the C. R. A. were presented each by five delegates, consisting of the Rabbi, President, and three other members: Sinai, Isaiah, Kehillat Anshe Ma'ariv, B'nai Sholom Temple Israel, South Side Hebrew, B'nai Jacob, Zion, Judea, B'nai Abraham, Beth El, Emanuel, and Sholom. The meeting was called to order by Dr. Joseph Stolz. Mr. Adolf Kraus was unanimously elected temporary chairman, and Rabbi Felix A. Levi, secretary. A constitution was then proposed, discussed in detail, and adopted. It provides that "The name of the organization shall be the 'Chicago Federation of Synagogs' whose object shall be to gather information regarding the religious status of the Jews of Chicago and suburbs, and to devise ways and means for promoting their religious welfare, for fostering a fraternal spirit among the congregations, and for securing general co-operation, without interfering with the autonomy or mode of worship of any constituent congregation". While the congregations represented at the first meeting were, with but two or three exceptions, of the Reform wing, it was provided that every duly organized Jewish congregation of Chicago and suburbs, with the endorsement of two constitutent members, and with the approval of two-thirds of the executive committee, be admitted to membership in the Federation. The affairs of the Federation will be managed by a president, vice-president, secretary, and treasurer, who, with eleven additional members, shall constitute the executive committee. These are to be elected at the annual convention which, after the initial organization, is to be held in the months of Tishri. The constitution further provides that the annual dues of members shall be ten dollars, and that "every constituent member of the Federation shall be entitled to send two delegates to the annual convention, one of whom shall be the Rabbi; and for each additional fifty members in excess of one hundred members, each congregation shall have the privilege of sending an additional delegate to the annual convention, subject to the payment of five dollars per delegate". A resolution adopted by the body instructs the temporary officers of the Chicago Federation of Synagogs to call a meeting for the permanent organization of the Federation as soon as seven congregations shall officially signify their desire to affiliate. This meeting is to take place not later than the middle of December.

The Federation of Synagogs is the outgrowth of the First Annual Spring Conference on religion and the synagog, held in Chicago on April 15 to 17, 1917. Prior to that, in a paper before the Rabbinical Association in 1898, Rabbi J. Rappaport of Beth El Congregation, urged a union of the congregations for the purpose of securing greater uniformity in days of worship and ritual observances. A few days ago, in a paper before the David Fish Lodge of the I. O. B. A., he returned to the same theme, this time treating the subject from a more practical standpoint. Finally at the first annual Spring Conference on Religion and the Synagog, Rabbi Samuel S Cohon of Zion Congregation, presented a paper on "The Need of a Federation of Reform Congregations in Chicago". Outlining the scope of work of such a Federation, he said: "Our congregations dare not rest content with providing for themselves. A great duty confronts them, of answering the call of the larger Jewish community for spiritual guidance. . . . The honor of Judaism demands of all of us that we put ourselves in its service. May, then, no obstacle be put in the way of this plan which promises to strengthen the cause of Judaism in this city. Judaism is greater than any one congregation, greater than any one person. Let us then remove all trivialities, and join hands and hearts in this sacred task".

In the discussion that followed, Dr. E. G. Hirsch favored inviting the affiliation of Orthodox as well as Reform Congregations. In this spirit, he moved the adoption of Dr. Stolz's resolution calling for a preliminary meeting to discuss the formation of a local Federation of Synagogs. This meeting has now taken place; and, inasmuch as all the representatives there present expressed themselves in favor of having their congregations join, the Chicago Federation of Synagogs may now be considered a fact.

"PALESTINE TRANSFORMED"

A striking editorial on the Zionists' achievement in Palestine and their ultimate aim was published in the Boston "Herald" of October 9th, 1917, under the foregoing caption. It was the leading editorial for that issue of the paper, and it is herewith reproduced verbatim.

"And where shall Israel lave her bleeding feet?
"And when shall Zion's songs again seem sweet?
"And Judah's melody once more rejoice
"The hearts that leaped before its heavenly voice"?

Byron it was who thus questioned, and in his time not even the beginning of an answer could be given. Today Hebrews all over the world are looking forward to the peace settlement which is to furnish what the first Zionist Congress of August, 1897, called "A home for the Jewish people in Palestine, secured by public law". How much has been done in the interval to make that consummation possible we learn from A. M. Hyamson's account of Palestine; the "Rebirth of an Ancient Race" just issued by Alfred A. Knopf of New York. In this book a Fellow of the Royal Historical Society of London tells for the first time the story of the repatriation movement which began about forty years ago and culminated in that intensive outflowering of it which we know as Zionism. The background of the narrative is a survey of the nineteen centuries that have passed over the Holy Land since the exile; its new, bright chapters make one of the romances of history and embody a record of race achievement edifying for both Gentile and Jew.

"Something of what might be in Palestine was sketched out by Disraeli in his Zionist romance, "The Wondrous Tale of Elroy", published in 1833. Nearly half a century later began the work which was to put realized ambitions in the place of fictional forecasts. Waste and unyielding for centuries, the Holy Land faces the world today a productive and happy community, lifted to its new economic rank by the energy, intelligence and enterprise of Jews. It is impossible to suggest a title of the directions in which these qualities have successfully asserted themselves. The colonists are not only agriculturists; they excel as experts in fruit-farming, in floriculture, cattle breeding, fruit preserving, silk worm culture, silk-spinning and poultry farming. The experiment has shown that the Jew is efficient and at home on the land wherever he settles. "The undying adaptability of the Jew", says Dr. Hyamson, "has displayed itself in Palestine, as elsewhere. The child of the walled-in alleys of the Ghetto has become the child of the open air, of the green and golden field, of the orchards and the fruit gardens, of the blue skies". Nor are the industries neglected; we read of the output of wool and silk, and that "the Palestinian faience, majolica, glass, and the beautiful copper and silver work enjoy renown throughout the world". Meanwhile provision is made for education. Libraries have been introduced. The colonies enjoy modern sanitation, and there is a medical and dispensary service in each.

"Not yet, of course, is this wonderful development complete, nor is it politically secure. Palestine needs highways, railroads and harbors; she needs above all a just and stable government, and this can come only through the safeguard of a European guarantee. The disadvantage of the present situation under Turkish rule is the consciousness that it offers no safeguard against aggression by a foreign power. The Jews of Palestine ask no position of privilege among the Arab populations whom they have benefited, but they have a right to ask the protection of their hard-won achievements and the conditions needed for further progress under an administration which can be trusted. Dr. Hyamson's appeal in their behalf for the assistance of Christendom will have the response which it so richly deserves".

MONEY REACHING PALESTINE THROUGH ZIONISTS.

The Provisional Zionist Committee is glad to announce that all the remittances recently made by it to Palestine through its Transfer Department have been received by those for whom the money was intended.

It is able to announce also that it has overcome all the difficulties of exchange due to the depreciation of Turkish money, and that all the remittances made through the Transfer Department are being honored at the par value of American money.

BRITISH-BORN JEWS OBJECT TO DUTY IN SPECIAL CORPS.

Some two or three months ago I called attention in these columns to the edict issued by King George providing for the formation of a number of purely Judaic regiments with the object of turning to military account the services of those hundreds of thousands of Russian and Polish Jews in the British Isles who prefer to serve under the British flag, rather than submit to expulsion as aliens and to deportation to Russia for enrollment in the army there. I also added that the officers would be recruited from Jews already holding commissions as lieutenants, captains, majors and lieutenant-colonels in the British army.

It had been anticipated that British-born Jews already serving in the British army, or newly drafted, would be anxious to join these Judaic regiments, where special arrangements exist with regard to observance of their religious practices and for the preparation of the special food prescribed by the doctrines of their faith.

Proud of British Citizenship.

In this the authorities have been disappointed. British-born Jews of every rank, officers and men, have manifested the utmost reluctance to join these Judaic regiments, on the ground that they have nothing in common with these alien Jews from Russia and Poland, and that moreover, the fact of their belonging to the Hebraic religion does not in any way affect their British citizenship nor their British patriotism.

Whereas on this side of the Atlantic the members of the Jewish race who have attained high office or great fortune, always show an immense amount of sympathy and fellow feeling for their alien co-religionists from Russia and Poland, there is little or nothing of the kind to be found among the English Jews, and the one cabinet minister in England who was more vigorous in his demands that the alien Jews should either join the British army or be ruthlessly expelled to Russia was the secretary of state for India, the Rt. Hon. Edwin Samuel Montagu, younger brother of Lord Swaythling, and an orthodox Jew.

Operating Near Jerusalem.

These newly formed Judaic regiments of the British army, as quickly as their elementary training has been completed, are being dispatched to join the British forces now operating in the neighborhood of Jerusalem under the command of Gen. Sir Edmund Allenby, and it is hoped that they may be induced to settle in Palestine on the conclusion of the war. The present Lord Rothschild is heartily in favor of the scheme, and differs from his father in giving his support to the cause of Zionism, which he strongly advocates, insisting that the salvation of the Jewish race is to be found in their being grouped into an autonomous state in the Holy Land under the suzerainty of one or more of the allied powers.

His father, the late Lord Rothschild, in spite of his being very orthodox, was always in favor of assimilating the Jews born in the British Isles with the English people, instead of their remaining a race apart and distinct from the ordinary English citizen. He was very lukewarm toward Zionism, but declared that if contrary to his belief, it should ever come to fulfillment, he would insist upon having the appointment of its perpetual ambassador to the court of St. James.

The late Lord Rothschild differed on almost every subject with his eldest son and successor in the family honors, and when he died he left the bulk of his colossal fortune, together with the chieftainship of the great Rothschild banking concern in London, to his younger son, Charles. As the present Lord Rothschild is unmarried, it is probable that his peerage will in due course pass to his brother Charles.—Washington Post.

RIOTING IN BETHNAL GREEN.

The London Jewish Chronicle reports there was serious rioting in Bethnal Green on Saturday, Sept. 22, 1917, which was renewed the following Sunday, and as a result of which several Jews were seriously injured.

There had been some apprehension among the Jewish residents at Bethnal Green for some time owing to continual threats of the non-Jewish inhabitants. It is not known exactly how the disturbances started, but it is stated that a number of women accompanied by several soldiers came out of a public house on Saturday evening and attacked some Jews at Blythe Street, alleging that there had been some jeering at wounded British soldiers by Russian Jews. The disturbances on that evening do not, however, appear to have been of an extensive nature. But Sunday afternoon's attempt seemed to have been organized.

JEWISH DUTY IN WAR TIME.

By Rabbi David de Sola Pool.

How should the American Jews as Jews stand in this war crisis? The ready answer of patriotism is being given in word and deed by American Jews on every side. When the land that we love is faced by attack, we rally to its defense as Americans. From the time of the war of the Revolution, through the war of 1812, the Civil War and the Spanish War, to the present day, American Jews have done at least their full duty in war times as American citizens. Is this in fulfillment of Jewish teaching, or is there anything in Judaism that conflicts with this martial loyalty? It is as well for us to know clearly whether Jewish pacifism or Jewish law is in any way opposed to or preventive of our giving military service as citizens in a time of war.

The Jewish ideal is peace. Our Bible first held up to mankind the vision of peace on earth and turned man's thoughts to the time when "nation shall no more lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more". The seal of the priestly blessing is peace; our most important prayers, the blessings of the Shema, the Amidah, the Kaddish, close with peace. The Jewish greeting is "peace be with you". Israel knows no greater calamity than war and no greater blessing than peace. The nation that is the suffering Messiah of mankind suffers more through war than any other nation, so that one of the most deeply felt prayers of the Jewish people is the prayer for peace.

Yet "there is a time for war and a time for peace", as Koheleth declared, and the records of our Jewish history are filled with stories of war. In view of the present political situation, it would not be relevant to discuss the wars of aggression waged by the Jews of old. But the Biblical record does throw light on our duty as Jewish citizens if the sword has to be drawn in defense against aggression.

Both Jewish history and Jewish law give unequivocal answers to our question whether our being Jews interferes in any way with the fulfillment of our duty to our country. Jewish history calls on the Jew to fight for the defense of his land when all efforts to avert war have failed, and Jewish law allows nothing, not even the Sabbath, to interfere with the full carrying out of a soldier's duty.

The patriotism of the Jew has been proven a thousand times. The world may well learn, and we Jews should never forget, that this brilliant military patriotism is called for by our Jewish religion—when the war is a milchemeth chobah or milchemeth mitzvah, an obligatory, consecrated war, a war that has to be waged in the interest of world morality or a war of defense.

LOYALTY OF AUSTRIAN JEWS.

The Austrian Jews have had several unpleasant experiences recently in the Reichsrat, several attacks having been made against them by deputies. The Polish anti-Semites urged the Ministry to compile statistics of the military efforts made by each nationality and creed in Austria in order, as they hope, to discredit the Jews for their alleged "insufficient response and lack of enthusiasm for field service." Deputy Dr. Straucher delivered an eloquent address proving that the Austrian Jews have done their duty and that in the tenth Izonzo battle Jews greatly distinguished themselves. The Austrian Jewish newspapers also print a long list containing 477 names of recently decorated Jewish officers, soldiers and doctors for bravery at the front. The list also includes the name of First Flight Lieutenant Sack, the son of the deceased Rabbi of Semichov, who obtained 10 decorations and the First Class of the Iron Cross.

BARON SONINNO FOR AN INDEPENDENT PALESTINE.

Baron Soninno, Premier of Italy, has made an unequivocal declaration in favor of an Independent Palestine.

In addressing the Italian Parliament on the subject of that country's military operations in Palestine, Baron Soninno said:

"Against Turkey, England has recently undertaken a new and vigorous military action in Palestine, in which the bravery of the British army has already been demonstrated. The Italian flag is represented in that expedition, a fact which corresponds to its international and moral interest. Palestine must be freed from the Turkish yoke; once so freed it would be neutralized, internationalized and declared an independent state".

"Palestine", the organ of the British Palestine Committee, a non-Jewish organization, calls attention to the language employed by Baron Soninno: "He speaks as though definite decisions have been taken by the Allies as to the form of the future Palestinian settlement".

History of Negotiations Between the Jewish Board for Welfare Work and the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League in the United States Army and Navy

On July 29 and 30, 1917, the Executive Committee of the Order met in Chicago and as up to that time the public had not been informed of any activities of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work, our Executive Committee decided to undertake welfare work for Jewish soldiers and sailors. That was published by the Associated Press. Three days afterwards a circular letter reached this office informing us that the Welfare Board had met and elected Colonel Harry Cutler as chairman.

The B'nai B'rith Welfare League in the meantime had started its work and within a few days had partly completed arrangements in several camps.

A notice was sent to the Jewish press from the office of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work to be published on or after Aug. 6, 1917, that "with the election of Colonel Harry Cutler, of Providence, R. I., as chairman, the Jewish Board for Welfare Work in the United States Army and Navy takes its final form of organization". And that the board had already begun work in a number of forts by establishing "cordial relations in co-operation with the Y. M. C. A. and other organizations operating within the camps".

Rabbi George Fox, who is in charge of the B'nai B'rith Welfare Work, wrote to Colonel Cutler on Aug. 28 as follows:

"In accordance with agreement set forth in the conference between yourself and Mr. Sig Livingston, that there is to be no duplication of welfare work among the soldiers, I beg to inform you that the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League of the I. O. B. B. has established headquarters for welfare work for Jewish soldiers in the following places: Camp Dodge, Des Moines, Ia.; Camp Grant, Rockford, Ill.; Washington, D. C.; Camp Shelby, Hattiesburg, Miss.; Baltimore, Md.

"Arrangements are being made for the establishment of additional headquarters in the following places: Camp Sherman, Chillicothe, O.; Camp Pike, Hot Springs, Ark.; Camp Logan, Houston, Tex.; Camp Custer, Battle Creek, Mich.; Camp Bowie, Fort Worth, Tex.; Camp Wheeler, Macon, Ga.

"We are endeavoring to ascertain true conditions in all cities in which camps are to be located. We are following, however, the principle in our work that there is to be no duplication of work as far as we are concerned".

Under date of Aug. 30, 1917, Colonel Cutler wrote to Dr. Fox that there was no agreement entered into between Mr. Sig Livingston and himself when they met in Washington and that it was advisable to agree on a modus operandi for the co-operation of the Order with the Jewish Welfare Board.

On Sept. 1 Mr. Kraus wrote to Colonel Cutler as follows:

"It seems to me that the best plan to adopt is to divide the work with the understanding that one organization should not interfere with the other in any manner. Your organization can take charge of certain cantonments and we of others. You take such as with the membership constituting your committee you can handle better than we can, we to take charge of such as we can handle better through our membership. As you will very likely have more funds at your disposal than we will, you can take the majority".

On Sept. 8 Mr. Kraus again wrote as follows:

"I am somewhat surprised that you made no comments whatsoever to the suggestions contained in my communication to you concerning the Jewish soldiers' and sailors' welfare work. There ought to be no rivalry between the organizations. I repeat what I said in my previous letter to you that had we known that your committee would do the work as energetically as you seem to have started in lately, we would not have undertaken it. We only undertook the work because apparently nothing was being done by your committee. But having undertaken it and having made arrangements in some of the localities, we are not in a position to back out now".

On Sept. 12 Colonel Cutler and Mr. Kraus met in Chicago, conferred from 10 a. m. to noon and finally came to an agreement. As Colonel Cutler had to leave on the 12:40 train, there was very little time left after an understanding was reached to reduce the agreement to writing, therefore only the following was dictated and signed by both:

"For the purpose of having the two organizations co-operate, it is agreed that all the money collected shall be sent to Mr. S. S. Rosenstamm, treasurer, to be used in connection with the welfare work of Jewish soldiers and sailors. On the Administrative Committee the B'nai B'rith may name three members. The B'nai B'rith organization to take charge of the following camps" (nine posts were named):

Mr. Kraus insisted that as a condition precedent to any plan of co-operation that the Jewish Welfare Board, consisting of several associated societies, be treated as one "organization", and the B'nai B'rith Welfare League as another "organization", and that the two organizations co-operate as such so as not to destroy the identity of the B'nai B'rith organization, which was agreed to; therefore it was stated in the agreement that "the two organizations should co-operate". It was clearly understood that the merger was to be of the activities and not of the organizations. It was also agreed that an appeal for funds should be sent out in the name of the two organizations. At that conference Secretary Seelenfreund was present.

An appeal for funds was sent out by the Eastern Committee, but over the signatures of individuals and not in the name of the two organizations, unless the postscript to the appeal be considered as complying with the agreement. .

Under date of Oct. 1, Mr. Kraus wrote to Colonel Cutler calling attention to the fact that such an appeal as agreed to had not been issued, and the following:

"I told you I would never again consent to be amalgamated with any other Jewish organization so as to destroy our identity. We are willing to co-operate fully, honestly, enthusiastically and squarely and ask for nothing to the advantage of our organization at the cost of any other organization".

Prior thereto, namely, on Sept. 24, Mr. Kraus, then of opinion that an agreement had been entered into, mailed a letter to the lodges informing them of the fact that the two organizations had joined activities. What the understanding of the B'nai B'rith League was of the agreement appears from a communication sent by Secretary Seelenfreund on Sept. 19 to Mr. Samuel Folz, chairman of the Michigan branch of the B'nai B'rith Welfare League, which in part is as follows:

"Mr. Cutler, President Kraus and I had a conference lasting about two hours. As a result of same we agreed to a close co-operation between the Welfare Board for Jewish Soldiers and Sailors with headquarters in the East, and the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare Board for Jewish Soldiers and was provided, however, that certain points where the B'nai B'rith has already been engaged in actual work, be and remain under the direct supervision and control of the B'nai B'rith Committee. * * * The B'nai B'rith is joining the Eastern Committee in an appeal for funds. All funds required for the maintenance and support of the nine camps under the B'nai B'rith supervision and control to be furnished by the general treasurer in New York City; all funds collected and to be collected under the auspices of the B'nai B'rith to be sent to the general treasurer Mr. S. S. Rosenstamm". * * *

Notice was received that the Administrative Council of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work would meet on Oct. 15, 1917. Rabbi Fox attended that meeting.

Samuel A. Goldsmith, secretary of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work, prepared and mailed a report of that meeting, which in part is as follows:

"The question of co-operation and merging of the B'nai B'rith with this Board was raised by Mr. Hartman. Dr. Fox, the executive secretary of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League of the I. O. B. B., thereupon stated that the I. O. B. B. had seven paid workers in the camps allotted to it. That the I. O. B. B. was to have direct supervision of the work in nine camps; that the I. O. B. B. as an organization had not merged, but had merged merely its activities in this direction with the Welfare Board; and that, finally, it was his impression that Mr. Greenebaum was to remain treasurer for the purpose of receiving funds collected through the B'nai B'rith, such funds in turn to be sent by Mr. Greenebaum to Mr. Rosenstamm. Col. Cutler then stated in substance that his conference with Mr. Kraus, grand president of the I. O. B. B., had given him the impression that the I. O. B. B. would merge its activities with this board in this direction, that the I. O. B. B. was to have direct supervision of nine camps; that at Mr. Kraus' solicitation the Welfare League of the I. O. B. B. was not to lose its identity; and that workers previously appointed by the I. O. B. B. were to receive their credentials from and sent their reports to headquarters office in New York. Mr. Cutler also reported that as a result of his conference with Mr. Kraus it had been agreed that all moneys were to be sent in to Mr. Rosenstamm, national treasurer, without delay".

The above official report, however, is incomplete, for it fails to record that when Colonel Cutler admitted that Rabbi Fox's statement concerning the agreement was correct, three representatives of as many insignificant organizations protested against a recognition of the B'nai B'rith which was not accorded to their respective organizations. One of those "leaders" substituting sound for sense shouted so loudly that Mr. Warburg pleaded for less noise. That plea checked the thundering voice for one minute, but that was all.

Colonel Cutler replied to the protestants by saying that he had made the agreement with the B'nai B'rith, that it would have to stand, if not he would resign as chairman of the Jewish Welfare Board. From all this it appears that there was no difference in the interpretation of the agreement between Mr. Kraus and Colonel Cutler up to that time. Had it remained so a break between the organizations would have been averted.

Rabbi Fox, however, brought on his return from the New York meeting a memorandum of the agreement as approved by Colonel Cutler, to be submitted to Mr. Kraus, which set forth the conditions hereinabove referred to and in addition thereto the following conditions:

"That after the present supply of American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League stationery for the camps is exhausted, that the stationery at all camps be uniform and bear the imprint of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work in the United States Army and Navy.

"It is understood that in view of the merger of all the activities in the central organization as per agreement, with the particular exceptions whereby we (the B'nai B'rith) are given special control in certain reserved camps, that we (the B'nai B'rith) become a constituent organization of the central body, as reorganized, in the same sense as those other organizations who have joined therein".

This was submitted to Mr. Kraus. He refused to sign it, as it was contrary to the agreement entered into with Colonel Cutler, for the only construction he could give to said rider to the agreement was that it would nullify the original agreement and that it seemed to be drawn to please the representatives of the three protesting organizations.

Mr. Kraus said that the rider objected to by him as far as Colonel Cutler's committee was concerned, could only be a matter of form and not of substance, whereas with the B'nai B'rith it was a matter of substance and that Col. Cutler probably overlooked the fact that those conditions were in violation of the spirit of the agreement entered into, that he would ask Colonel Cutler to meet him in New York on Oct. 28 and that it was more than likely they would come to an understanding.

At the time the agreement was entered into between the two organizations Mr. Fosdick, assistant to Secretary of War Baker, had ruled that only those workers within camps would be recognized who represent the Y. M. C. A., the Knights of Columbus and the Jewish Board for Welfare Work. Therefore it was agreed that Colonel Cutler was to obtain for the B'nai B'rith workers proper credentials if such should become necessary.

Secretary of War Baker invited Mr. Kraus to meet him in Washington on Oct. 29 to a conference to be held between the Secretary of War and the chiefs of leading fraternal organizations for the purpose of considering means for constructive welfare for soldiers. This Mr. Kraus construed as a determination by the Secretary of War to recognize fraternal organizations and that he would not have invited him to come to Washington to tell him that they would not be recognized.

On the morning of Oct. 27 Mr. Kraus met Mr. Warburg in New York. He voluntarily informed Mr. Warburg of the invitation of the Secretary of War, and told him no matter how favorable the Secretary's ruling might be, he intended to stand by his agreement made with Colonel Cutler. [The rider above referred to did not form part of the agreement.]

On the evening of that day the General Committee of District No. 1 was in session. Mr. Kraus attended that meeting and there he learned that Colonel Cutler had said that he had made all the concessions he was going to make to the I. O. B. B. and he could not and would not make any more. Colonel Cutler failed to meet Mr. Kraus in New York.

Mr. Kraus left for Washington Sunday night. Before leaving he discussed the situation with one of the leading members of the Order and announced that as he had written to Colonel Cutler that the new conditions to the agreement were not satisfactory and as the colonel not only failed to meet him but did not even call him up on the phone, he must assume that the colonel has spoken his last word, and as the new conditions meant not only a merger of the organizations which was stated in the original agreement should not take place, but that the merger was to be confined to activities, the new conditions demanded could only be construed as an abrogation of the original agreement and the end of the proposed partnership.

In Washington the conference was held between the Secretary of War and representatives of various fraternal organizations. We quote from a report made by E. St. Clair Thompson, special puty to Edward W. Wellington, general grand master, representing the General Grand Council, Royal and Select Masters of the United States of America, as follows:

The meeting was called to order by the Secretary of War.

The Secretary called attention to the fact that the government is in the business of raising and training a large army made up of young men taken from time to time from the usual environment of young men with regard to church, social and fraternal affiliations; that these men are being congregated in camps of unusual size, which are in fact cities of 40,000 or more inhabitants; that both because of the different method of selection as well as the large and more unique organizations of troops and the problems to be met and solved in connection with their handling, we are face to face with questions never before presented to us.

The Secretary alluded to the statutory provision made for caring for the religious side of camp life, in the legal provision for army chaplains, but said it was found that this did not meet the situation in all its social, fraternal and moral aspects.

After commenting on a large number of developments along this line since the mobilization began, the Secretary stated that the matter had shaped itself in his thought under two heads:

First—What shall we do for the soldier in camp?

Second—What can we do for the soldier in communities adjacent to the camp?

Nearly all the men have some traditional religious affiliation. The law provides for that in the appointment of chaplains. The functions of chaplains are entirely religious. In addition to that, is what we know as the social side. The Knights of Columbus and the Y. M. C. A. are built around that idea. We have now chaplains, the Y. M. C. A. and the Knights of Columbus, and lately the Y. W. C. A. has undertaken to help in the communities on the girls' side in providing suitable meeting places and surroundings where the men may meet women.

The committee on training camp activities has been at work on these problems and in considering what had been accomplished, the revelations made in [illegible] it would be a helpful thing ,but that considering the necessities of discipline and the various questions involved, he was also of the opinion that the major help to be rendered by fraternal societies is in the communities outside rather than in the camp itself, from which the soldier wants to go whenever he has an opportunity.

The Secretary declared himself as being without prejudice and that what he sought was the best way; the way which will produce the most efficient use of co-operation.

The Secretary alluded to the fact that some of the camps are temporary; that the purpose of training these men is to send them to France; that it would be a serious financial burden to encourage the erection of buildings in the camps if there were no other objections; that the government has had to purchase or rent most of the land on which these camps are located and that the demand for more land is constantly increasing. He therefore suggested that the men present in the meeting work out some plan by which a single building could be erected which would be available for all the societies so that by a committee they could manage the building and have these places as central points for distribution of literature, etc.

The thought of the Secretary, as developed, seemed to be to leave intact matters so far as they now exist in connection with training camp activities, but that the societies represented in the meeting should get together in some additional campaign.

He was asked if that was his thought, and if it was, that he give some suggestion of how a movement independent of the committee on training camp activities could result in co-operation in the work of that committee, in which the various societies represented in the meeting would have no part.

This led to the development of the thought that the Y. M. C. A. does not represent all the Protestant affiliations or social activities or viewpoints and that the Knights of Columbus is wholly sectarian; that none of the societies represented desire the establishments of units of their particular organizations for the purpose of conferring degrees, etc., having lodge meetings or the like, but that they felt that neither the Y. M. C. A. or the Knights of Columbus or the Jewish Welfare Society adequately covered the field and that so long as the present order continues it will be difficult, if not impossible, to secure wholehearted enlistment in the work to be done on the part of those social and fraternal organizations which are now barred from privileges such as are accorded the Y. M. C. A. and the Knights of Columbus; that what is demanded is that all be treated alike and all be subordinated to the exigencies of necessary discipline of the camps; that they were perfectly willing to work outside of the camps and were doing so, but that they thought they should have a "look-in" on the inside as well as these now particularly favored; that the motive and desire of every society was to be of service to the country. It seemed to be a consensus of opinion that no lodge work of any kind should be permitted in the camps or any other practice allowed which would interfere with discipline or arouse controversy among the men in the camps or those outside of the camps who might be interested. The Secretary was again told that there had been much dissatisfaction because of the order that no organization except the Y. M. C. A. and the Knights of Columbus would be allowed inside of camps, but the Secretary was assured that if he would outline a plan which would meet with the approbation of the representatives there assembled they would put it through.

A vote was then taken expressing the sentiment of those present that it would be unwise to have buildings erected in the camps for holding meetings of lodges or fraternal organizations for conferring degrees, etc. The Secretary then said: Every society or order which desires to erect a building for social use in a camp is free to apply to the commanding officer and he is free to grant permission if the land is available, but it is understood that they must, of course, take and abide by the judgment of the commanding officer as to that and that the Secretary of War would be available for consideration of any injustice which might arise or be thought to have arisen so far as such action on the part of the Secretary would not be an overruling of the discretion of [illegible]

The Secretary here called Mr. Raymond B. Fosdick to the chair and retired for consultation with Mr. Thomas A. Edison. A pleasant diversion was the entrance of Mr. Edison into the room, where he was greeted with much applause and then retired.

Mr. Fosdick then took the chair and the discussion proceeded. Various attempts were made to frame a resolution which would meet the views of those present, and finally a motion was adopted that the chair appoint a committee of seven from this meeting to draft a set of resolutions concerning the participation of fraternal organizations in social work and helpful endeavor in the various camps and cantonments; that this committee report to the conference at 9 a. m. tomorrow, the 30th of October, in the War Department; that the resolutions as drafted by the committee may be considered by the conference for adoption and that the conference meet with the Secretary of War at 10 a. m. for presentation of the action of the conference on these resolutions.

The chair named: George Fleming Moore, sovereign grand commander, S. R. S. J., chairman; Frank C. Goudy, grand sire, Odd Fellows; John J. Brown, supreme chancellor Knights of Pythias; Morris Sheppard, banker, Modern Woodmen of the World; Dr. J. C. Pace, M. W. O. America; Colonel P. H. Callahan, Knights of Columbus; Adolph Kraus, president B'nai B'rith.

The discussion was participated in by Messrs. Thompson, Brown, Smith, Moore, Pace, Sheppard, Goudy, Kraus, Seelenfreund, Callahan and Flaherty.

Tuesday, Oct. 30, 1917, 9 a. m., the conference of representatives of fraternal societies on training camp activities of the United States army reassembled in the War Department at the office of the Secretary of War for the purpose of hearing and acting on report of the committee appointed on the 29th instant by a meeting of these representatives to draft resolutions expressive of its desire in this behalf.

Present: E. W. Bradford, John J. Brown, Joseph A. Burkart, P. H. Callahan, George E. Corson, Raymond B. Fosdick, Frank C. Goudy, Adolf Kraus, Dr. J. G. Pace, W. W. Mansfield, Joseph McLaughlin, George F. Moore, W. S. Parks, Morris Sheppard, Rev. Hugh T. Stevenson, E. St. Clair Thompson.

The meeting was called to order by Judge George F. Moore, E. St. Clair Thompson, acting as secretary. The resolutions as prepared by the committee were presented by the chairman of the committee, Judge George F. Moore. Upon consideration and after general discussion the resolutions were perfected and unanimously adopted as follows:

Washington, D. C., Oct. 30, 1917.

To the Conference of the Executives of the Fraternal, Benevolent and other Societies assembled on invitation of the Secretary of War:

Your committee appointed to consider and report our conclusions suggest the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That we earnestly thank the Secretary of War for his clear, frank and able statement of the reasons on which the former action of the War Department was based, relating to the erection of buildings within the camps and cantonments of the armies of the United States; we thank him for the patient and courteous hearing which he has accorded us and we especially thank him for his wise, patriotic and timely announcement that hereafter all the camps and cantonments of the armies will be open for the erection, occupation or use of buildings within them or for other desirable activities in such camps and cantonments, which shall have first obtained permission from the general of the army or other officer commanding the particular camp or cantonment under rules prescribed by the Secretary of War, and that after the erection or arrangement for use of building or buildings within the camps or cantonments, or the beginning of desirable activities therein by such fraternities or groups of fraternities, all of them should be accorded equal facilities and privileges for doing social, fraternal and benevolent work and service.

Resolved further, That since it is necessary to provide the means to erect or arrange for use of buildings and carry on the work which these orders desire to undertake and to determine the modes by which our services may be rendered effective to secure the voluntary support of the orders which we directly represent, as well as the constituent and associated [illegible] ties to engage.

Resolved further, That it is the opinion of this conference that no order or society should be permitted to confer degrees or engage in any of its secret work within the camps or cantonments.

Resolved further, That we pledge to the Secretary of War and our government our best efforts to help and assist in the work and service of securing and maintaining the comfort, entertainment and well-being, moral as well as physical, of our soldiers without the encampments and cantonments as well as within them.

(Signed)
George F. Moore, Chairman.
Morris Sheppard,
Frank C. Goudy,
John J. Brown,
P. H. Callahan,
J. G. Pace,
Adolf Kraus.

The Secretary of War: Except as to the first three paragraphs which thank the Secretary of War, the resolutions seemed most happily conceived. This means, then, as I understand it, that the several societies here represented, or with such affiliated bodies as are in their judgment more or less cognate, will work out plans according to their own theory as to how they can best be satisfied and those plans will come to me and my end of it is to draw orders to make those plans effective within the limits of possibility and opportunity. It is understood that all this effort is to be along helpful, social and fraternal lines making for clean lives, good health and effective service to the government and that in carrying on these lines of activities no secret work of any organization is to be conducted inside of the camps and cantonments and that this is not desired.

Attention was called to the fact that much work has already been done by these societies on the outside of camps and that it was desired that duly accredited representatives of these societies having members within the camps should be accorded the privilege of going into the camps and cantonments, greeting the boys and inviting them to places of provision for them without the camps. This was assented to by the Secretary of War, who stated that this would be a matter of detail within the discretion of the commanding officer".

On Nov. 2 the Advisory Board of the Executive Committee met and decided that the rider demanded in the submitted agreement by Colonel Cutler could not be accepted, that the agreement was to be construed as rejected by the Jewish Welfare Board, that therefore each district should undertake such work as it may deem proper on lines suggested by the Secretary of War.

Mr. Kraus was subsequently asked whether he did not think that by working independently of the Jewish Welfare Board it would result in working at "opposite angles". Mr. Kraus answered: "We expect that when the boys leave the camp to visit the neighboring city our members will invite them to their homes, treat them hospitably and entertain them properly in clubs and assembly halls so as to keep them out of bad company which might undermine or destroy their health and efficiency. I hope that by so doing it will not be construed that we work at "opposite angles" with any other society, and as we have over 50,000 boys in the army there is room for everybody to do his bit. We do not expect to be able to look after all the camps, nor will the other organizations be able to do so; we shall be satisfied if we can do the work well in nine camps or even fewer. We intend also to issue to our members in uniform an identification card which may be useful to them on the other side of the ocean.

"I regret that the agreement as entered into was not deemed sufficient to the other organization. I believe that Colonel Cutler intended to carry out our agreement and that if he had met me in New York he would not have insisted on the new conditions.

"It is useless now to speculate why new conditions were submitted for my approval. While in New York I would have made an effort to reach Colonel Cutler by phone to find out why these new conditions were inserted, but having been told that he said he had reached the end of his rope I did not deem it proper to ask.

"I do not think that the work each organization has undertaken will suffer any by the organizations having parted company. The only question now for each organization to consider is how to render the best service without unnecessary [illegible] dertake, and that all the lodges will vote for a law which will be submitted to them taxing each member one dollar a year as long as the war lasts, to be used for soldiers' welfare work. I call upon our members in communities where Colonel Cutler's committee will be in charge of a camp to render to that committee and to the soldiers there such personal service and with such love and devotion as they would if such camp was in charge of the members of the Order".

A RESTORED EDEN.

Canon Parfit, regarded as one of the leading authorities on economic conditions in Mesopotamia, has written an article on the marvelous changes which have occurred in that country since the British occupation. He says:

"In less than two years British occupation has transformed Lower Mesopotamia into something approaching a paradise. The population of Busrah has enormously increased and the inhabitants have never been so well off. Excellent wharves have been erected on the banks of the great Shat-el-Arab for the oceangoing steamers which under the Turkish regime took days to accomplish what can now be done economically in a few hours. Every creek has been bridged in this 'Venice of the East'; numbers of roads have been made; electric lights have been installed; electric trams have invaded this long neglected port, while an equally wonderful transformation is already taking place in the city of Bagdad.

"Thousands of men have repaired the river banks, the Euphrates is becoming navigable, and for the first time for centuries there have been no pernicious floods this year in Lower Mesopotamia. Two railway lines are spreading away to the north; an embankment of twenty miles length has recovered for agricultural purposes a marshy area of forty-eight square miles, where wheat fields, vegetable gardens, dairy farms and poultry farms, all under the care of professional farmers from India, are adequately providing for the needs of the British forces in Mesopotamia and preparing to send food supplies to the British Isles.

"These astounding rapid changes are only illustrations of what can easily be done by a just and wise administration of a fertile country like Mesopotamia".

Hellenism and Hebraism

By Dr. Max L. Margolis

Written for the B'nai B'rith News

The theme is not of my own choosing. It was thrust upon me by a New York audience. Had I had the framing of the title under which a weighty subject was to be discussed, I should have said: Hellenism and Judaism. Hebraism appears to be a term just now very much in vogue. Perhaps it is the finer, more genteel name, by which we wish that to be known which constitutes the very essence of ourselves; exactly as in polite society, ourselves naturally being present, we are spoken of as Hebrews. Jews seems to be the baser name, with a basest for the use of the gutter. So in Russia likewise the finer appellation is Yevrei, Hebrew, for the less noble or rather ignoble zhid. If we consult history, we must own that we are Hebrews, descendants of Abraham the Hebrew. But Abraham had, not to speak of his relations, like Lot the progenitor of Ammon and Moab, many descendants, the Ishmaelites, for example, who accordingly might be called Hebrews likewise. And Isaac—this looks almost like a Sunday school lesson—had beside Jacob, who was called Israel, another son, of whom he was very fond, Esau the Edomite. So the Edomites were Hebrews likewise. Of course, the Ammonites and Moabites and the Ishmaelite Midianites with all that ilk and the Edomites are gone, and so as the survivors we may lay claim to the family name. As a matter of fact, however, we have felt ourselves to be distinct from these near relations, cousins of various degrees. We had feuds with them; our ballad-singers lampooned them; our warriors fought them and spared them not; and many a time we were worsted, as it will go with the fortunes of war. Ishmael, the son of Hagar, the handmaid, stood with our medieval poets for the Islam faith and civilization; and Edom, from whom sprung Herod, the friend of the Romans, came to be identified with Rome, imperial Rome, papistic Rome, and the whole Christian West. These differences assume a religious coloring, and in speaking of ourselves as Israelites and Jews we accentuate our religious distinctness. There was a Hebraism before there was Judaism. It was political rather than anything else. In so far as they were conscious of it in Samaria and Jerusalem, it meant a policy of Palestine, including the coast, for Palestinians. It was the dream of far-sighted monarchs, be they of Tyre and Zidon or of Jerusalem. David and Solomon strove to translate the dream into reality. It meant a certain tolerance with the non-Jewish Palestinians. That is the meaning of altars erected to Milcom the abomination of the Ammonites and Chemosh the god of the Moabites, right in Jerusalem; of the Baal temple in Samaria; of the alliance between the courts of Samaria and Tyre-Zidon, culminating in Ahab choosing for his spouse Jezebel, the Phoenician princess. David had shown the way. But the troubler of Israel would make no pact with Baal. Elijah waged war against Hebraism. Palestine had better be broken up into its cantons and, weakened, fall a prey to the northern or southern empire, to the lords of Mesopotamia or to the Pharaohs of Egypt. Israel and Judah should live their own life. According to a well-known professor we Jews must not lay claim to the title of Israelites, which belongs to the few hundred souls around Nablus. This is a question of origins. With that we are not concerned. Israel and Judah are brothers, according to the Scriptures. The prophets cemented the union. In the end Israel disappeared. But Judah stepped into the inheritance, and what was worthy in the traditions of the north was incorporated into the faith of the south. And the result was Judaism, aye, the rigid Judaism of Ezra and the scribes shut off by an actual wall from the schismatic Samaritans and the rest of the peoples of the land and the whole world besides.

The first important contact with the Hellenic world and civilization came through Alexander the Great and his successors. Hellenistic states were built up in Asia and in Egypt. The Jews of the dispersion felt the impact of Hellenism most directly. In Alexandria the Jewish community with royal assistance paved the way for the Jew's entrance into the Hellenic life. Japheth, the father of Javan, was made to dwell in the tents of Shem. The Bible was translated into Greek. So Judaism was brought home to the Greek, and a propaganda began which slowly won the world over to the point of view of Jew, albeit when it reached its consummation it meant a dilution of Judaism and finally its submersion in the waters of Christianity, which is but a form of Judaism made palatable to the taste of the Greek and the Gentile. But the Greek Bible, much like Mendelssohn's High German translation, was to serve as the text book by means of which Jews prepared themselves for access to the wisdom of Javan. The result was a reasoning away of all the ceremonial aspects of Judaism which kept the Jew distinct and a rephrasing of Judaism in terms of Greek philosophy. Now Greek philosophy, originally of an Oriental origin, had emancipated itself and become the sum of all that is distinctive in the culture of Greece, that for which we love her, that which constitutes her contribution to humanity. Greek philosophy is scientifically orientated. It began in a comprehension of the cosmos in terms of natural science. In its final flights it meant the enthronement of reason. Man, thinking man, was elevated to the pedestal formerly occupied by the gods and goddesses, that merry and laughing crowd of Olympus. Yes, Jehovah laughs likewise. But his laughter is a mocking, taunting one, which shatters the nations risen against the Lord and His anointed. There was a groping in Greece after the One God. What difficulty Socrates had in defining piety, when pleasing the one god might be displeasing the other. But the stress was on man, man freed from the tutelage of the gods, placed upon his own resources, a law unto himself and a very god. Morality was imperative, not because it was God-given, but it was given by the gods because it was imperative. The iron fate that stood over the gods assumed shape in the matematical morality which not even God could escape. For a while, rather a long while, the Judaistic element in Christianity held sway in the West. It is true, much pagan by-work was intermixed, by-work of the crudest kind, gleaned from all the mysteries and religious conventicles current in the empire. When the new learning burst the power of the Church, the humanistic movement which resulted in the Reformation and in all the secular stirrings of our own days, meant ultimately a brushing aside of Judaism and the re-introduction of Greek ideals. Of course, Judaism is a force in the world, and will not so readily be set aside. The combat is still on. It takes form in the struggle between authority and free thought, between religion and science. And while the struggle is going on, the old and the new rub shoulders, and the western world is torn between two systems. It wants to be Greek, but it is enmeshed in Judaism.

Palestinian Jewry fought the battle with Hellenism on its own soil. The pietists who fought under the banner of the Maccabees had neither the time nor the power nor the perspective to reason out the meaning of the contest. Hellenism presented itself to them in an Antiochian recension. It came home to them in gymnasiums, where Jewish athletes grew ashamed of their bodily mark of distinction. Judaism was introspective and cared little for externalities. The flesh was not exactly vile, but it was not spirit. The body was there as a vesture for the soul. Cleansing the body was with the Jew a religious duty. We bathed on the eve of the sabbath. For was not man made in the image of God? Yes, man was made in the image of God, but was not God. Isaiah saw God as the thrice Holy, unapproachable in His purity. He conceived of civilization with its appurtenances, skyscrapers and dreadnoughts included, as an attack upon the majesty of God. It was a sort of religious nihilism, which would level civilization to the ground that God's judgment might be vindicated. Not the reason was to be made the master-guide—"lean not unto thine understanding"— but the will, the will to be trained to subject itself to the will of God. "Thy will be done". So prayed Jesus. "Extolled and Hallowed be the Great Name, in the world which He created according to His will". So pray we with the rabbis. According to Renan, the Semites are essentially men of will-power, not men of reasoning powers. Our monotheism was not reasoned out, it was revealed. It constitutes the intuition of the Jew. "In the beginning God created the world". This world is God's world, and is the best of world's. So far we are optimists. Man is essentially thoroughly bad. That is our pessimism. Man must therefore submit himself to law. All attacks on Judaism are antinomian. Drive the law from our midst and you strike the axe against what is vital in Judaism. We do the right because God willed it, not because it is right, the Greek philosophers and Kant and the ethicals notwithstanding. Yes, our teachers make much of freedom of the will, a sort of moral autonomy. But in a world governed by God human autonomy can only be a seeming one. "Greater is he who doeth what is commanded than he who doeth what he did not command". Every good act with us is a mitswah, a commandment of God. For we are monotheists. We cannot serve two masters, the God whom we acknowledge with our lips and who is really God, and the little god in our bosom whom we wish to supplant the Lord. That little god is a strange god, imported from without, from the wisdom of Javan. Torah, law, authority, the will of God: those are the Jewish contributions to the world.

The light is still on. We have our Hellenists. And they are not merely the assimilationists. We have the ultra nationalists who would transplant western civilization to the hills of Palestine. The Hellenism which the Maccabees drove out is to be brought back under a Jewish mask. There are the secular Hebraists who would bring back the days of Ahab and Jezebel. Now, I am not gainsaying the importance of the Hebrew language in our cultural renaisance. A humanized Jew in the dispersion is at best a half-Jew, and some say that he is no Jew at all. In Palestine we shall witness the humanized Jew who is a full Jew, nothing else but a Jew. But Hebraism alone will not make him a Jew. We cannot start with a clean slate. Much that is outworn, that is indeed an outgrowth of conditions in the dispersion will vanish. Life is inexorable, and given living conditions, the events will shape themselves. Even as the Hebrew-speaking child in Palestine re-creates the language, the Jew will re-create such Jewish forms as will be in conformity with the soil in which our culture must be rooted. But Judaism will remain. It must abide because it is ultimately our sole claim to individuality. We must live our own life, develop our own soul, find again the way to God, when once it is freed from all the rubbish by which it is now obstructed. In the end we shall come to recognize with that great Jewish bard that the wisdom of Javan is but blossoms and flowers, but devoid of the fruit which alone sustains, and that it behooves not to walk the devious paths of Hellenism and the Hellenistic west, but to tread the main road, the road of Judaism, which is the way of life.

BOOK REVIEW.

The Faith of Israel.

"The Faith of Israel" by H. G. Enelow, published by the Department of Synagog and School Extension of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, 62 Duttenhofer Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio. The price of the volume is 50c, postage extra.

Dr. H. G. Enelow's "Faith of Israel" is a volume that comes as a boon to Jewish religious schools. The confirmation grades of most of our schools have been without a sufficient number of adequate textbooks suited to the purposes of confirmation. The books in use have either been histories, which though proper enough for study purposes were nevertheless inadequate for the express needs of a confirmation class; or catechisms, in many instances altogether too advanced for boys and girls of confirmation age.

In the preface of his book, Dr. Enelow tells us that the Manual is the result of years of actual experience in teaching confirmands. It is the development of the answers given by him to the questions asked by his boys and girls. The presumption is thus formed that the book is one that lends itself to practical situations in teaching confirmands—a presumption that is made a certainty upon reading the Manual. Dr. Enelow displays the ability of making an exposition of the teachings of Judaism not only clear and coherent, but also interesting to pupils of confirmation age. The method, growing out of a series of conversations and questions, retains that personal characteristic, and thus gives an added attractiveness to the contents.

As Dr. Enelow puts it in the preface, "this work is designed as a survey of Jewish religion". It is not a history. Neither is it a catechism. Its aim is to unify the pupil's knowledge of the subject and to stimulate the pupil to further study and investigation. The first is accomplished by the text itself, while the second is amply provided for in the group of questions that conclude each lesson. These questions are not only recapitulatory, but also demand outside study and thought.

The "Faith of Israel" consists of twenty lessons, which in their entirety not only present a summary of Jewish religious development and its influence upon civilization, but also a bird's-eye view of the fundamental principles of Judaism and the ideals, cherished at present, by the Jew.

THE AMERICAN JEWI[illegible] COMMITTEE.

The Eleventh Annual M[illegible]

A resolution pledging [illegible] and whole-hearted support to [illegible] ernment" was adopted una[illegible] a rising vote at the ele[illegible] meeting of the American Je[illegible] Committee, the first since the United States entered the war, which was held at the Hotel Astor, [illegible] York City, on [illegible], Nov. 11.

The Executive Committee presented a report of its activities during the past year.

Great interest was manifested by the members in the matter of securing accurate statistics with regard to the participation of American Jews in the war. A number of the members, pointing out the need of educating immigrants in American history and civics and particularly as to the ideals and aims of our country in the present struggle, urged the committee to co-operate with patriotic agencies, already in existence which are doing work in this direction.

A resolution was adopted directing the Executive Committee to prosecute vigorously the work of collecting data respecting the participation of Jews in the war and to consider plans for patriotic educational work.

Mr. Marshall, the president of the committee presented the following resolution which was adopted unanimously by a rising vote:

"It seems fitting that at this the Eleventh Annual Meeting of the American Jewish Committee, the first since our entrance into the war at which are gathered representatives from all parts of the country, expression be given to the love, the devotion, the gratitude and the loyalty which fill our hearts and souls toward the United States of America, the land where we were born or which with open arms adopted us, the sacred shrine of liberty and equality, where tyranny cannot exist, where human rights have ever been triumphantly maintained, and where justice and righteousness have reached their highest development. We recognize in the war in which the entire American people is now engaged a condition unsought but inevitable, a conflict willfully and deliberately thrust upon a peace-loving nation, that dreamt not of spoils or conquest, and the direct consequence of machinations long concealed which threatened our repose, our independence, our honor and even our cherished freedom.

"In common with our fellow citizens of every race and creed, we renew our allegiance to our Government and to its flag which symbolizes the most precious hopes of mankind; we pledge to them our unstinting and whole-hearted support; and we dedicate to the perpetuation of American ideals and institutions, to maintenance of the honor of our country and the preservation of the principles for which it stands, our lives, our possessions, and those we hold most dear, to the end that liberty shall not perish from the earth".

The following officers were re-elected for the ensuing year: Louis Marshall, president; Dr. Cyrus Adler, vice-president and chairman of Executive Committee; Julius Rosenwald, vice-president, and Isaac W. Bernheim, treasurer.

The following members of the Executive Committee were re-elected for a term of three years: Isaac W. Bernheim, Samuel Dorf, Julius Rosenwald, Cyrus L. Sulzberger, and Mayer Sulzberger.

A communication was received from Dr. P. A. Siegelstein, president of the American Union of Roumanian Jews, calling attention to the pitiful plight of the Jews in that part of Roumania still under native rule, and suggesting to the committee that it consider the advisability of requesting the American Government to intervene. Mr. Marshall stated that this matter was receiving the serious attention of the Executive Committee and that it was expected that definite action would soon be taken.

Dr. H. Pereira Mendes, on behalf of a conference of delegates of the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations, the Union of Orthodox Rabbis of America, the New York Board of Rabbis and the New York Board of Jewish Ministers, drew the attention of the committee to the anti-Jewish attitude of contractors engaged in building cantonments for the United States Government in the matter of advertising for and employing carpenters. The president stated that this matter had already been taken up by the Executive Committee and was receiving attention.

An invitation to hold the next annual meeting in Philadelphia was received from the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce, but in view of the uncertainty of the times, the place of the next annual meeting was left to the discretion of the Executive Committee.

Sketches of Modern Jewish History

By Gotthard Deutsch

III. THE BEGINNINGS OF IMPROVEMENT

The oldest historic records are usually mere legends. They present, however, unconscious historic intuition. The oldest traditions of Roman history give us in regular succession always a belligerent and a pacifist king. Granting that these stories do not furnish us an exact record of actual events, they present the experience of real history, that in a monarchical state every ruler, when entering upon the duties of his office, is guided by the feeling that he must profit from the mistakes of his predecessor. Joseph II of Austria (1780-1790) is a classic specimen of this type. His mother, Maria Theresa (1740-1780) was a gifted and devoted ruler. She was, however, typically feminine in her religious devotion. The Jesuits had complete control over her, and their principles were of greater importance than any consideration for the welfare of the state. It is only consistent that she—to use her own words—"hated the Jews like the plague", and when Austria had suffered the second defeat in a war with Prussia, Maria Theresa yielded to the popular clamor for a scapegoat, as which the Jews seem to have been predestined everywhere, and ordered in 1745 the expulsion of all Jews from the Kingdom of Bohemia. Strong-willed as she was, she would not listen to the intercessions on behalf of humanity by foreign powers. The British ambassador to Vienna, who was ordered by his government to take the steps necessary for the repeal of the cruel laws, reported to the foreign office that intervention by foreign powers would hardly have an effect on the Empress, who is very jealous of her royal privilege, but finally she yielded, as she expressly stated, to the wishes of the population, and suspended the edict for ten years, thus disposing of it without formally revoking it.

Joseph II was of an entirely different character. An admirer of Rousseau and Voltaire, he proudly called himself "lover of mankind". To him every one of his subjects was a human being. We must not exaggerate the real meaning of this phrase, for Joseph II was after all an autocrat. He wished to do the best for his subjects, but they had to accept his idea as the only one leading to their improvement. In religious matters he was liberal, but not in the sense of free thought, as was his contemporary, Frederick the Great, but rather in the sense of modern reform Catholicism. He abolished a considerable number of monasteries, confiscating their property for educational or charitable purposes, reduced the number of holy days, and tried to simplify the ceremonies of the church. He had, however, no desire to accept Protestantism, or any other religious interpretation of Christianity. An interesting illustration is the following fact, which is not generally known. A number of peasants in the district of Pardubitz, Bohemia. had been imbued with the rationalistic spirit of the age, rejecting dogmatic Christianity, especially Trinity, and the Catholic ritualism, as mass and baptism. Probably feeling that the plain declaration of their standpoint would meet with greater difficulty, they took advantage of the edict of toleration concerning the Jews, promulgated Jan. 2, 1782, and declared themselves Jews. The Emperor could not well deny to new Jews the toleration which he had promised to Jews of Jewish descent, but he said, if these supposed converts were in earnest, they would have to adopt circumcision, and resign their right of owning rural property. A year later a similar movement, not hiding itself behind a Jewish profession of faith, appeared again in Bohemia. The matter was reported to the Emperor, who advised the local authorities not to proceed too severely, but if the people refused to yield to persuasion, they should be given "24 auf den Hintern" and if they still persisted in their profession of free thought, they should be compelled to declare themselves as Protestants, or should be exiled to Transylvania, where from the sixteenth century on scattered Unitarian communities had succeeded in obtaining toleration.

The magna charta of the Austrian Jews was the above quoted edict of Jan. 2, 1782. There still remained a great deal to be desired. The Jews were still restricted to certain sections of the Empire, within that section, to certain towns, and within these towns, in most instances to ghettos. They were also still excluded from all professions except the practice of medicine, and from all public offices, except certain employments in the revenue department, mostly connected with special Jewish taxes, which to a certain extent were retained. The restrictions will be illustrated by the following small incident: Wolf Samuel Lewi was elected by the congregation of Prossnitz as rabbi in 1786. He was a native of Boskowitz, where his father, Samuel Lewi Kelin (from Kolin, Bohemia), the celebrated author of the ritualistic work, "Mahazit Ha-Shekel" (1724-1806), had been living for many years, so both Wolf Lewi and his father were natives of Austria. The son, however, had become a rabbi of Aszod, Hungary and thus acquired naturalization in Hungary. This may have been done for the sake of obtaining the right to marry, which in Austria was subject to severe restriction. At any rate, the government decreed that the new rabbi would only be tolerated personally, but his children would not be considered Austrian subjects. He returned afterwards to Hungary, where he died as rabbi of Bonyhad in 1818. Descendants of the family became afterwards prominent manufacturers in Austria, and one member of the family, Max Anton Loew, acquired a rather unenviable reputation some twenty years ago, when after his conversion to Christianity, he became the attorney for the antisemitic leaders in Vienna.

The main advantage which the Jews obtained through the legislation of Joseph II, was that they were to be treated as fellow human beings (Nebenmenschen). Practically the principal advantage was the abrogation of the Jewish toll, and of the yellow badge.

It may be necessary for information on an important Jewish subject, to say a word on the "Leibzoll". It is true that this tax had a very humiliating character. Local authorities rendered it more humiliating, when they posted the tariff at the tollgate, which enumerated the toll to be paid for every head of cattle, horse, sheep, swine and Jew. Originally it was hardly intended as a humiliation. The Jew traveled on passports, and when passing through a certain territory the local authorities were responsible for his protection, either by furnishing him with an armed guard, or by watching for his safety in a general way. For this he had to pay a tax, and probably paid it willingly. Afterwards, beginning especially with the fifteenth century, when Jews were excluded from residence in almost every place, of commercial importance, they still could visit the place for a day to transact business. For this privilege they paid a license, which again was rather a fiscal measure. In later days, as already stated, this tax degenerated into a measure, devised to humiliate the Jews. It was different with the yellow badge, which had originally been introduced by Pope Innocent III in 1215 for the sake of marking the Jew as an outcast. The Pope clearly points to the analogy of Cain, and declares that the Jews, as murderers of Christ, should be publicly branded as such.

Another important reform of Joseph II which, however, the Jews did not like, was the abrogation of the rabbinic tribunals, and the compulsion to do military service. The rabbinic tribunal was considered by the Jews a privilege, although in any number of instances all over Europe, and all through the mediaeval period, we find individual Jews, who evidently upon their request, were granted immunity from the rabbinic authority. In these instances, as we find it today in the United States, when corporations obtain their charter under the laws of a state, which are most favorable to their purpose, people selected that kind of law which was to their advantage. Generally speaking, however, the Jews considered the Talmudic civil law just as much binding as the ritual law. The Emperor, however, would not listen to any protest. He remained equally firm, when representative Jews petitioned him to repeal the law which subjected them to military conscription. Jews were in the beginning not drafted into the fighting forces, but served with the "train." The chief rabbi of Prague, Ezekiel Landau, though he very likely in his heart strongly opposed a law which compelled the Jews to violate the Sabbath, and made it almost impossible for them to keep the dietary laws, addressed the first Jewish soldiers on their patriotic duties, distributed "Zizith" and "Tefillin" among them, and advised that they make an agreement with their Christian comrades to do certain work for them on Sundays, so that they should relieve them on Saturdays. The Emperor, in addition, ordered that the Jewish soldiers should, as much as compatible with the requirements of the service, be protected in their religious scruples. He stipulated expressly that Jewish soldiers should not be required to do any work on Sabbath which Christians would not have to do on Sunday.

He showed his toleration also in school questions. There is a widespread error, found in various historical works, including that of Graetz. It is stated that up to Joseph II, Jews were not permitted to enter universities. This is not correct. Section 9, of the Law of January 2, 1782, says expressly: "Although the Jews were never prohibited from entering schools for higher education, their right to do so is herewith expressly stated". It was natural that few Jews, if any, ever tried to enter universities. The main reason was that outside of the practice of medicine, which besides was limited to the ghetto, and therefore could only support a man in very few places, no profession was open to them. A novel departure, inaugurated by Joseph II, was compulsory secular education. Some rabbis objected to having the boys bare their heads during the instruction, and the Emperor promptly ordered that they should not be compelled to do so. Similar was his attitude on the question, whether the Jews should be compelled to shave. The subject is somewhat obscure. The law merely says that the Jews should not be compelled to wear beards. It seems that such a law was in existence at some time, for we possess an opinion rendered on the subject in 1727 by the banker, Bernhard Eskeles of Vienna, who held the honorary office of Landesrabbiner of Moravia. He declares that such a compulsion had no basis in the Jewish law, and was even contrary to Jewish practice, because it was customary for young men to remove their beard, while the married men usually grew it. He merely wishes that the government should issue an order, prohibiting the use of a razor instead of scissors. If this was the case in 1727, it does not seem likely that a law compelling the Jews to grow their beards was in existence as late as 1780. We have, however, the authoritative testimony of Wolf Theben, a leader in the Presburg congregation (1732-1808) that a circular issued in March, 1783, demanded that the Jews should all be smooth shaven by a certain date. The congregation of Presburg sent a committee to Vienna, which was received in audience by the Emperor, April 23, 1783, which was the seventh day of Passover, and requested that this order be rescinded. The Emperor declared that it was not his intention to demand anything which would interfere with the freedom of conscience; that he had merely thought that there could be no violation of a religious law, because the Jews of Holland, who are strictly observant, are smooth shaven, but if they felt offended by this order, they should be at liberty to act in this matter the way they pleased. The only solution of this difficulty seems to lie in the conjecture that the law which declared the Jews should not be compelled to wear beards, was interpreted by some officials as a compulsion that they should shave.

The example of Joseph II found imitation in other countries. The Markgrave of Baden demands of his counsellors a report how the Austrian laws could be applied to the Jews of his country. This order, dated Feb. 3, 1782, is an immediate result of the move made by Joseph II. The Elector of the Palatinate, ordering in 1784 that the Jews of his state be treated as merchants and "Mitmenschen", shows in his very phraseology the Austrian influence. Similar is the law issued about the same time by the Bishop of Mayence, who demands that Jewish schools be organized, and that Jewish children attending Christian schools should be kindly treated. Grand Duke Leopold of Tuscany, Joseph's brother, and afterwards his successor as German Emperor, not merely protects his Jewish subjects against rowdy acts during the carnival season, but gives them a certain political right, allowing them to delegate some of their members to the city council with full right to vote ("con voto e con lucco ed in sedia uquale agli altri"). The carnival practices of Pisa gave to the frolickers the right to stop any Jew on the street and to demand of him his weight in confetti as ransom. This was not as bad as conditions were in Rome. where the mob was permitted to compel the Jews to take part in the races, and to pelt them with rotten fruit and even with rocks, while they were running, or to compel them to eat a heavy meal before they started on the race. It is significant that even in the papal states a more humane conception in the treatment of the Jews began to make itself heard, though not felt. The counsellors of Avignon, which was then under papal dominion, in 1783 advised the pope not to enforce the severe anti-Jewish laws, though their motive, at least as far as they declare it, is that the Jews, treated too severely. might, as many did before them, emigrate to Bordeaux, Nimes and other French cities, which then winked at the still existing law which excluded them from France proper.

Another significant event, though small from the point of view of the numbers which it affected, was the admission of the Jews to Sweden. Up to the end of the seventeenth century Jews coming to Sweden were forcibly baptized. Afterwards they were sentenced to a term at hard labor. In 1775 the engraver, Aaron Isaac of Prussia, was officially admitted to residence, and permission was given to him to bring a limited number of other Jews to Sweden, so that he could live in accordance with the Jewish law. This incident requires some historic explanation in order to be understood in its significance. Jews were excluded from all manual trades, organized into guilds. Even the laws, issued by Joseph II and by some of his contemporaries at the end of the eighteenth century, which directly demanded that the Jews should make themselves more useful by taking up technical labor, made some restrictions in favor of the guild privileges. The trade of an engraver, probably on account of the small number of people to whom it could give employment, was one of the few free trades. We, therefore, find the Jews engaged in it from a very early period. They mostly exercised their trade by going from place to place trying to find work. Sweden needed in 1775 new seals for the state. Aaron Isaac was recommended, and did his work so well that the authorities, wishing to have this trade represented in the country, offered him permission to stay there permanently, and he consented, if enough Jews were to join him to form a small congregation. It is interesting to notice on this occasion that as late as 1838 the Jews were restricted to four cities, and it was not until 1870 that they obtained full civic and political equality.

The mechanical treatment of history will find no stronger refutation than in the relation of Frederick the Great to the Jews. Personally a free thinker of the rabid Voltairian type, and declaring that he saw no superiority in the moral teachings of Christianity over that of any other religion, and even going so far as to state that the Christians of his time were no Christians, because they persecuted the Jews, although Jesus was a Jew, he had an utter dislike for that "rabble" (Kroppzeug), as he termed the Jews. Being a decided protectionist, he recognized their commercial importance, and gave some special privileges to Jews who would open manufactories; he would even encourage Jews as merchants in retarded districts like those acquired from Poland, but he did not believe in a general revision of that mediaeval principle of restriction which finds its expression in the term "Schutzjuden." Perhaps the most typical instance is his decision in the case of a Jew of Koenigsberg, who went into shipbuilding. The other shipbuilders of the city petitioned the king to issue an injunction against this Jew who encroached on "the few means of earning a livelihood, from which this nation has not forced us out". The king in an order dated Jan. 17, 1782, declares that the Jew may finish this ship which he began to build, but could not continue in this industry. This order was issued two weeks after Joseph II's edict of toleration, which declared the intention of the Emperor to assist Jews in becoming more useful members of society.

One of the most despotic measures of Frederick the Great was an order issued in 1769, which demanded that every Jew who desired a privilege, such as the right to marry, to buy real estate, or to engage in a business, which was not expressly permitted to the Jews, had to buy 300 thalers worth of china from the royal manufactory, and to export it. This order was often misunderstood, owing to the romantic habits of people, and it was claimed that the Jews had to buy all

The Divine Touch in Patriotism

By Rev. Dr. Leon Harrison

A divine touch in our times is the awakening of the spirit of the Nation into a new patriotism. It is becoming a passion; a slow flame that is burning brighter in all of us, raising us to a higher moral temperature, even in this easy-going, loose-limbed America. Like all great emotions of humanity, patriotism is intensified by the sacrifices that we make for it. Men are spontaneously giving up great sums of money for the Nation. And they are submitting to unprecedented taxation willingly, and with a solemn realization that they are the servants of a great cause; that if there is no conscription of their life they must submit in a noble spirit to the conscription of their fortune.

We see many men, master minds, serving the Government in the most responsible positions, without a penny of remuneration. And then there are other sacrifices. They are the most solemn of all; they go down to the very roots of life and affection—I mean the surrender of sons to the Nation's cause. Whatever the pain, whatever the apprehension in the heart of the mother and the father, yet they realize when the Nation calls their sons must anwer, for all true love—love of religion, love of country—means sacrifice. Yea, though it be the giving up of an only son, yet we must pay the price for the best that is in us, in the sacrifice of those we love the most. Consider the spirit in which the plain men and women of the Nation are meeting this unheard-of thing; how a fire is burning within them that was never there before.

A new spirit is being kindled in us that makes us understand for the first time in a generation what patriotism really means; what true Americanism means.

This spirit is a gift from God. It is a divine enthusiasm. It is a consecrated fire. And the times that have engendered it—these tumultuous, turbulent times—are surely in the hands of God.

A million of more of these young men have eagerly offered themselves to the service of the country; to defend the liberties of our Nation and of other nations that are fighting for their lives. Many of these young men are fresh from the schoolroom and the college campus. They are about to face poisonous gases and living flames, and every deviltry of modern war. And when they have been drafted they have taken their place in the ranks with patriotic ardor, intent on playing their part like men.

These young men realize—mere youths, many of them—that there is something worse than death, to be feared more, to be hated more, and there is something better than life to be desired more; worth every sacrifice, worth more than the poor breath of existence in our nostrils. These young men make us realize that there is no decadence here; that the martial virtues have not perished; that common, everyday men may have in them the makings of heroes; that invincible courage and self-sacrificing enthusiasm may abide in the hearts of men snatched from the counter, and the plow, and the forge, and the carpenter's bench. Common men have become uncommon men. War's blasting flame has burnt the crude, human alloy into tempered steel.

Who would have believed it? And yet we have seen it with our own eyes. We have seen the Anglo-Saxon race. the French, our own men risking their lives as if they were the veriest trifles, looking steadily into the face of death, hour after hour, year after year, not only grimly, but light-heartedly, without a tremor, without a moment of faint-hearted shrinking. This is infinitely more than the vaunted chivalry of old.

This, then, is not a degenerate age. This is not an age of warfare simply by machinery; there must be a man behind the machine, and a heart of courage in that man, a flaming soul in him, to fight and venture all for the flag, a fluttering, painted rag with a few stars on it and a few stripes—and yet to these young hearts this scrap of drapery symbolizes something infiinitely more worth while than ease and safety and ignoble survival. It symbolizes their country and its freedom, and the freedom of other lands bullied, and threatened, and wickedly invaded. No light things these, and no light sacrifices are asked for them. They are solemn things—sublime—the fruit of the seed that God has planted in men is the heroism and greatness of soul. God gave us life that some day this divine spark might be struck from us. Each soldier that goes out to serve his country may thus say, humbly, yet proudly, "My times are in Thy hands".

We see God's spirit moving in this great people and inspiring each man more and more not to live for himself, but for the Nation to make every conceivable sacrifice to save and strengthen the Nation. We see a marvelous spirit of co-operation replacing selfishness. Men are no longer living for themselves alone. As we are nationalizing transportation and food supplies and many industries, so we are nationalizing our petty horizons, and they are being swept outward, until the common man today is thinking lightly of his petty interests and selfish profits, as compared with what he can do in the common cause for which he is willing, if needs be, to spend all that he has, and all that he is. A spirit of co-operation is here; a spirit of collectivism, a willingness to serve and sacrifice, and to subordinate self-centered aims to the one great cause to which we pledge our hearts' deepest devotion.

This realization of our common responsibilities, this arousing of our collective conscience means an awakenng of the Nation from spiritual lethargy, from the fat sleep of inner stagnation. It means the tearing away of the average material-minded man from the worship of Mammon and selfish ease. It is, after all, only the fires of war that thus can fuse many classes together, many races, all sorts and conditions of men, so that they think as one, feel as one, act as one, so that each American is a miniature America, and carries in his heart the destinies of this mighty Nation.

And, finally, I can not but consider the liberation of Russia as a proof and evidence of the living God in the history that is now being made before our eyes; in the colossal drama that is now being enacted. Russia may not be playing the leading role. Some may look upon her with contempt and others with anger, but they do this great people wrong. Russia is still paralyzed from the ancient fetters that ate into the very flesh. Russia is still drunk with the new freedom. The Russian people must work out their own salvation and learn to tread with firm step the great pathway that they have opened for themselves.

What matters that they falter; that they are torn hither and thither by conflicting currents; that they are intoxicated by Utopian dreams of both social and political regeneration. They perhaps think that all inequalities and the injustice of life can be uprooted and banished as by the touch of a magician's wand. It is wholly natural for men to stagger after they have long been bound and shackled; their eyes are dim, for they have long been deprived of the light of liberty, and the minds of men long enslaved are a chaos of conflicting emotions, of wild aspirations. Their dream and desire of a sudden transition, of a perfect commonwealth. without delay, without gradual adaptations, has relaxed discipline and authority and caused the collapse of Russia's arm of flesh.

She will regain her strength; she will harmonize her efforts; she will, in God's own time, gird her loins with power. Her momentary futility and feebleness matters little. The great thing is that Russia has arisen; that she has broken her shackles; that 150,000,000 human beings that were slaves are now sovereigns of their own destiny; have now stepped out of the house of bondage, and have joined the great fellowship of free nations.

And it simplifies the situation for us who are Jews, at last to be able to view this great conflict with a single mind. We could not forget, although in sympathy with the Allies, that Russia was their associate, and that there was one-half of the Jewish race, physically starved, mentally degraded, herded together, brutally oppressed, without refuge, without hope. As Jews, our chief anxiety and solicitude were for them; our help was poured out abundantly for their succor, and yet it was but a drop in the bucket. The problem seemed insoluble; the situatoin was hopeless; one-half of a great people were in a living hell. And then, as by magic, the darkness was dispelled by the dawn of a new day; a miracle of history happened. The poor creatures that had been trodden upon by the brutal foot of oppression now held themselves erect, and lifted up their heads proudly in the full dignity of men. The problem that was insoluble was solved by God. The problem of the Russian Jew was solved with the problem of the Russian people.

A Time That Tries Men's Souls

By Edward Chauncey Baldwin, Ph. D.

In the latter part of the eighteenth century there lived in America a man who was much in the public eye, and who, like other men in public life then and since, was much criticized. They caller him agitator and atheist, and ever since in America the name of Tom Paine has been a synonym for infamy. But, though Tom Paine deserved some of the obloquy heaped upon him he had one transcendent virtue. He loved liberty with sincere devotion. Moreover, he had a gift of expression that enabled him to say things in a memorable way. Some of the phrases he coined have become household words. Such is the sentence with which he began one of his appeals to the American colonists, "This", he said, "is a time that tries men's souls".

Today we are living in an age to which that designation applies even more aptly than it did to the stirring times in which Tom Paine lived and wrote. We, both Christians and Jews, are living in a soul-trying time because for all of us it is a time of transition. Today the Christian sees the historic creeds that he supposed were as deeply rooted and as firmly fixed as the everlasting hills discredited because they are no longer tenable by a living faith—and Christianity IS a living faith whose vitality, like that of Judaism, is attested by its power to change. Not only the creeds but the activities of Christendom are changing. Christian missionaries in the South are devoting themselves to the eradication of the cattle-tick and the boll-weevil as a means of laying a secure economic foundation for the evangelical work that is to follow. Similarly Christian missionaries abroad are teaching sanitation and social hygiene, introducing "the heathen in his blindness" to the beneficent uses of the bathtub as a preliminary to work that was formerly regarded as exclusively the missionary's function. In every way the emphasis is being shifted from the individual to the larger social unit—from the salvation of the individual soul to the salvation of society.

Such a change of emphasis has given rise to a corresponding change of watchwords. Instead of world-renunciation, we hear much today of world-consecration as the phrase best adapted to express the ideals of an age that believes the salvation of society for the present a more desirable goal to strive for than future sainthood for the individual.

The results in Christendom of such a change of emphasis, with its accompanying change of watchwords, has been uncertainty and distress in many hearts. The average man does not know where he stands in matters of religious opinion. Men are living on a kind of theological watershed between the old and the new —the old ways of thinking discredited, and the new not yet formulated.

The situation in modern Judaism is strikingly similar. Judaism, too, is changing, and many pious souls in Israel, also, are troubled. The so-called liberal movement in modern Judaism, while it has emancipated Judaism from the limitations that an uncompromising orthodoxy would have forced upon it, has made this a soul-trying time in Israel. Take, for example, the partial elimination of Hebrew from the religious service. To this is undoubtedly due, at least in part, a gradual dwindling of a knowledge of Hebrew among Jews and a consequent growing ignorance of the literary, legal, and spiritual treasures of that language. Similarly, by calling in question the binding character of Rabbinic law, liberal Judaism has weakened the bonds that held the Jew to the past, and weakened also his strength to resist the inroads of modern life. So, to both Christian and Jew this time of theological and religious change is a time that tries men's souls.

For yet another reason we are living in a soul-trying time. The spectre of militarism is today stalking across the stage of the world's life, and dominating the world's activities as the ghost of Hamlet's father dominates the solemn tragedy that Shakespeare wrote. It seems as if men in their insane folly had thrown to the winds the most precious thing the world possessed—its ideals. It seems as if idealism were dead, and as if there were nothing left to do but to sing its requiem.

But the requiem-mass of idealism will not be sung, for idealism is not dead. It is not dead in Christendom. M. Maeterlinck's rather florid assertion is entirely justified by the facts. "This world-war, despite its insanity", he says, "has been a bloody but magnificent proof of greatness, heroism, and the spirit of sacrifice. Humanity has risen above itself and surpassed all that it had hitherto accomplished. Never before have nations been seen capable for years in [illegible] renouncing their repose, th[illegible] their wealth, their comfort—all that they possessed and loved down to their very life in order to accomplish what they believe to be their duty". Nor is idealism dead in Israel. On the banks of the Neva and the Rhine, of the Thames and the Hudson, the scattered congregations of dispersed and sorrowing Israel are praying yet for the coming of that kingdom wherein dwelleth—not the solemn mummery of stately creeds, not militarism, not even "preparedness"—but righteousness and peace.

Righteousness and peace—the first a prerequisite for the second—were, and are still, the ideals of Israel. In neither of them have men hitherto really believed. Instead of believing, as the prophets taught, that national salvation depended on national righteousness, men have believed that it depended on material strength, and have piled armament on armament, with the result we know. In 1868 France was able to mobilize three hundred thousand men in three months. In 1914 she mobilized three millions in fifteen days. Yet in neither case was France secure.

Today, though men may not universally admit that righteousness alone exalteth a nation, they are at least convinced that injustice is unprofitable, and that social justice is essential in the world's administration. Despotism does not pay. The Sultan of Turkey last year levied taxes of thirty per cent on his twenty-four millions of subjects. He actually received less, however than did Queen Wilhelmina of Holland with only six millions of subjects and a fairly normal tax rate. The world is at last awaking to a realization belated and long deferred, that only upon a basis of social justice can enduring peace be based. The message of Mr. David Lloyd George to America was more than a private opinion. It was the expression of the conviction of the civilized world collectively. "The hope of the world", he said, "is that America will realize the call that destiny is making to her in tones that are getting louder and more insistent as these terrible months go by. That destiny lies in the enforcement of respect for international law and international rights".

Just now the securing of justice in relations between nations, to say nothing of the fulfillment of the hope of Israel and of Christendom in the coming of the kingdom of righteousness and peace, seems remote indeed. We are living in the darkest hour of modern history when religious certitude, and the ideals by which men live seem alike to have been irrevocably lost; but it is the hour before the breaking of the day. The superficially splendid structure of European civilization is rapidly crumbling into dust. When the process of its demolition is complete, when the battle smoke and the fumes of the poison gas have blown away, the long, slow, painful process of rebuilding will begin. A rebuilt edifice is never the same as the one that it replaces. Generally men try to build better. Usually they construct on a better foundation. That the reconstructed fabric of European civilization will be based upon a foundation of social justice—justice in international relations, and justice between man and man—this is at least a reasonable hope. Its fulfillment will mean the triumph of Israel's ideals, for it will mean the measurable realization of the hope of Israel for a time when righteousness shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.

RUSSIAN MUNICIPALITIES RESPECT JEWISH RELIGION.

In a number of Russian municipal councils the question whether Jews be allowed to attend to their business on Sunday is receiving careful and favorable attention. In some of them the question was decided in favor of the Jews, on the ground that the economic conditions of the towns involved would suffer by compelling Jews to keep two days of rest. It is interesting to note that the municipal council of the town of Homel, noted for many anti-Jewish excesses in olden times, decided to hold no sessions on the Sabbath day. The council, consisting of 101 members, includes not less than 57 Jews, and in deference to the wishes of the majority the council will henceforth hold no meetings on the Jewish Sabbath.

Surely oppression turneth a wise man into a fool, and a gift destroyeth the understanding. Better is the end of a thing than the beginning thereof, and the patient in spirit is better than the proud in spirit.—Ecc.

The Religious Training of Our Children

By H. Eliassof

No American Jew who still adheres to Judaism and is concerned about its future in America, will deny the fact that the question of the religious training of our children is of the utmost importance to us. Every American Jew who takes any interest at all in this serious question will fully agree with the assertion that if we are at all anxious to have our religion continue in its full glory in the midst of our children when we, their parents, will have departed from life, we must train them to be our suitable successors, our worthy heirs, who will deserve to receive this priceless legacy of our religious treasures by being fully equipped for the appreciation of its great value; by being willing and ready to preserve, protect and perpetuate it at all costs, as our fathers did before us and as we endeavored to do during our lifetime; by striving with all their might, as we did, to realize all the golden Jewish hopes which lived in the souls of our blessed ancestors and by keeping and fanning the fires of our faith which were the beacon lights of our life and of the lives of the countless Jewish generations that preceded us and from whom this precious inheritance descended to us through the ages. If we really wish that they shall prove to be and to do all that and come up to our full expectations, we must provide them in their young days, in their susceptible and amenable years with the right religious instruction, we must spare neither money nor trouble to furnish all the needed religious schools, all the capable religious teachers necessary. Even if we cannot bring all the Jewish children in America, that the future of our faith the Jewish religion, we must at least take good care that not too many of them shall grow up without any religious training whatever.

The great question is: Are we American Jews doing our full duty in this regard? Are we really securing the future of Judaism in America? The leaders of American Israel point with pride to the many new Jewish congregations which are established every year all over the land and to the numerous synagogues and temples which are constantly being built in the different Jewish communities of the country. They raise a shout of triumph and reassure the American Jews that all is well with Judaism in America, that the future of our faith is safe and secure here and there is no cause for care and worry. But they overlook the fact that thousands upon thousands of Jewish children are growing up in the big American cities, the large Jewish centers, who hardly know that they are Jewish children, for they have never entered the door of a Jewish religious school and have never heard a word about the Jewish God and the history of the Jewish people. These children who are ignorant of all Jewish thought, alas, are greatly in the majority among the Jewish offsprings in our land and their numbers are growing greater every year. Will the Temples and Synagogues secure the future of Judaism in America when the time may come when there will hardly be any Jews here who have learned to love the God of Israel, to understand the meaning of Judaism and to feel a longing to pray in the house of Jehova?

Let us take Chicago for an example and we will find the most startling conditions in regard to the religious training of our children. About fifty thousand Jewish children attend the public schools of Chicago. The attendance of our children in the Jewish Sabbath schools to receive instruction in the Jewish religion does not exceed three thousand. In many of these schools no Hebrew is taught and the Jewish children grow up unable to read even the very few Hebrew prayers which are still retained in the modernized prayer books of the Temples. Say five thousand more of our children are attending the different Talmud Torahs, the Hadarim, and some of whom are receiving private instruction in the Jewish religion, Hebrew and history. This reaches a total of eight thousand Jewish children who are taught something, though it is little enough, of the faith of our fathers, while more than four-fifths of them are growing up without the slightest knowledge of Judaism and are permitted to remain totally ignorant of the teachings of the Torah and to become strangers to their God and to their people. And it is no better, if not worse, in New York, Philadelphia, Boston and Baltimore, or in the other large Jewish centers. The great troubles are that we have neither enough religious schools nor a sufficient number of capable teachers. We build gorgeous, showy Temples and Synagogues and pay starvation wages to the religious teachers of our children and do not make it worth while for any of our capable young men to choose religious instruction as a career, the consequences of which are that for our religious schools we have to accept anybody and everybody who takes religious teaching as a side line to some other occupation, for which he or she is very often unprepared, unsuitable and unfit and more often unequipped with the necessary knowledge. Most of our Jewish congregations are closed narrow circles and exist for the exclusive benefits of little groups, the few paying members only. They have absolutely no communal spirit, they exist for themselves and for nobody else. If a Jewish child of a non-member comes to their religious school and wishes to be admitted to a classroom to be instructed in the Jewish religion the rude and unsympathetic questions with which the child is bombarded by the members of the august school board are more apt to drive the poor child away from the school than to invite and welcome it to stay and to come again. Very few of our congregations think of providing some room in their religious schools for any Jewish children whose parents may not be able to become paying members of the congregation. While there may be some among our people who can afford to contribute to the support of some congregation and are shirking their duty, the religious school is certainly not the place to reckon with this fact. A religious school cannot be called a religious institution at all when it attempts to sell its benefits for hard cash. The main aim of a Jewish religious school can be no other than to spread the knowledge of God as much as possible among the Jewish children who can come to it, irrespective whether their parents are paying members of the respective congregation or not. It must help to decrease the number of Jewish children uninstructed in Judaism and not to swell the income of the congregation. The above stated deplorable conditions exist to a great extent because too many of our congregational leaders do not fully understand the duties of the Jewish congregation and the Jewish religious school. These harmful and pernicious conditions also exist because we have not enough religious schools and not enough eligible teachers. The so-called Jewish entertainments for our children in our community houses, in our social centers, do not help us much to raise the young generation as Jews in the real sense of the word. We surely cannot expect our children who are left without the right religious instruction to dance themselves into our faith, to play themselves on the piano or on any other musical instrument into the knowledge of our history or to swim through the natatorium and sprint through the gymnasium into our literature. All these physical exercises and art accomplishments are no doubt desirable features of modern society, but they cannot and do not answer the need of more religious schools and better teachers. The writer of these lines has devoted the best years of his life to religious teaching in our Sabbath Schools. For many years he was the principal of the religious school of a prominent Jewish congregation and he knows what he is writing about to be true facts. It is for the want of such schools and such teachers that the greater number of our children grow up without the restraining influences of religion, which no doubt is the reason why so many of them break the barriers of moral and social laws, enter the schools of crime in the underworld and graduate as pick-pockets, gangsters, bank robbers and hold-up men, classes of criminals which have in late years increased in our midst to an alarming extent. And what about white slavery, the pale ghost which stalks about in our midst and cannot be exorcised and completely laid? All these frightful apparitions are new spectres in the house of Israel, our people never knew them in former years, at least they never troubled us to such an extent when all Jewish children were raised as Jews, but now we American Jews find it hard to deny that our house is haunted. And it is a well known fact that all our wayward sons and daughters are of those who are totally ignorant of Jewish lore and Jewish life. Who is to blame for such a lamentable state of affairs if not we, ourselves? Can we lay our hands on our hearts and say that we have not in the least contributed to the development of these terrible conditions in our midst? Must we not confess to our conscience that for our own salvation and for the salvation of our children we must hasten to raise more of our children as Jews and that to attain this end we must have more religious schools and better religious teachers? We must have teachers who are themselves fully familiar with the true tenets of our faith, with the faithful facts of our history and the original sources of our vast literature, who will know how to teach our children to love their religion, to glory in the history of Israel and to be proud of Jewish literature.

At present nearly all of our religious instructors are drawn from the ranks of our public school teachers and from the lines of post confirmants who are in the main only graduates of our Sabbath schools and possess very little Hebrew knowledge. They are, no doubt, fully able to prepare the children for a Hanukkah hop or a Purim play, to recite a Mother Goose rhyme or even a popular poem of Tennyson or Longfellow. But hardly one of these teachers is capable of teaching the children to recite a verse from the sublime prophets of Israel in the original, or a stanza of any of our mediaeval poets, such as Jehuda Halevi or Ibn Gabriol, or of any of our modern Hebrew singers like Adam Hakohen, Leon Gordon or Dr. Meir Halevi Letteris, who have expressed real Jewish thoughts in the most beautiful and inspiring sentences. The teachers of the Talmud Torahs may have greater Hebrew knowledge, but most of them know nothing of modern methods and utterly fail to impress the children who go to the public schools where they notice the difference between a modern teacher and an old-fashioned "bahur".

For the purpose of providing our religious schools with capable Jewish teachers, a number of Chicago Jews in whose hearts the love for Judaism is burning with glowing warmth and fervor have now started a movement to establish in our city a school for Hebrew teachers upon a real scientific basis. They aim to provide pedagogically trained Hebrew and religious teachers for our children, who shall plant the love of Judaism in their young hearts, arouse their interest in Jewish history and awaken their pride in Jewish literature. These men who are ready and willing to work in the vineyard of the Lord for the blessing of American Israel, need material means and spiritual support. This is indeed a timely movement and fully deserves to be supported by all Chicago Jews. Our Chicago coreligionists should rise like one man to the occasion and help to carry this laudable undertaking to a successful issue for the sake of Judaism and for the sake of the Torah our pride and our glory. Judaism and the Torah must continue to be immortal. Our children must follow in our footsteps to guard the life of our precious inheritance and to spread God's truth and everlasting peace to all the ends of the earth.

AMERICA'S STEWARDSHIP OF DEMOCRACY

By Edward N. Calisch

Taking the incident of Judah assuming the responsibility for the safety of his younger brother, Benjamin (Gen. xlix, 18-34, we realize that this incident owes its beauty to one idea above all others. That which chains our attention is not so much the love of Judah for Benjamin, nor the tense dramatic situation brought about by Joseph knowing his brothers and they not knowing him, nor the anxiety of the brothers over the detention of Benjamin, nor the sorrowing figure of the patriarch in the dim background of the picture. The hero of the scene is Judah and the quality which looms large in the incident is his sense of stewardship. At the time when the needs of the family were urgent and they were all helpless in the presence of the condition which Joseph had laid upon them and to which Jacob was unwilling to accede, Judah stepped forward and took up the brunt of the burden. The safety of Benjamin was the one consideration. "I will be surety for him", he said. And he was to the extent of sacrificing his own liberty.

This sense of stewardship is at the foundation of moral law. "Thou shalt" and "thou shalt not" are simply concrete expressions of the moral law. The coercion of conscience is not as a physical duress of which there can be no avoidance. The impulse of its obedience lies simply in the recognition of our human responsibility to the moral law and in the will to obey.

Until comparatively very recently there was a tendency to ignore the larger and finer moral issues. The recognition of ethical obligation, per se, was somewhat weak. Men were obedient to law, but it was the law of the statute book more than the moral law. Too many men there were who in their daily dealings were content to keep within the limits of technical legal safety, no matter how the moral boundary may have been trespassed. It is a happy omen that this generation is becoming awakened to the necessity of a larger sense of responsibility to our common moral obligations. The men who direct the big corporations, railroad companies and the larger industrial and commercial enterprises have awakened to the fact that their responsibility is as much to the public and the public welfare as it is to the stockholder.

It is not too much to say that in no small degree was it this sense of stewardship to the world-public that caused the United States of America to enter the war. I will not say that it was without provocation. But, granting to the full the impulse to resentment caused by the German attacks upon the property and lives of American citizens and the indignities offered to the American flag and the aspersions cast upon American honor, it is none the less true that the step as taken is with the highest motives. The avowed purpose, as expressed by President Wilson, "to make the world safe for democracy", is no idle phrase. Seeking nothing selfishly, desiring nothing of material advantage, the United States has pledged its material and human resources to the accomplishment of its declared purpose.

It is not inappropriate to say that Belgium stood among the family of nations as Benjamin did when accused of having stolen the cup found in his sack. The excuse for Belgium's ravishing was that it had secret understandings with the Allies. Whether true or not, the world knows that this was not the real cause. It was simply a belated, irrelevant attempt at justification.

Judah might have said that it was no more his business than it was anyone else's to assure the safety of Benjamin. He might have gone further and exonerated himself with the perfectly valid excuse that as far as he and his brothers knew Benjamin was a thief and brought his trouble upon his own head. But Judah's sense of stewardship was deep and keen. Guilty though he might have thought him to be, yet it was the obligation of protection, and he was ready to fulfill it with his own life.

Belgium's safety was the keystone in the arch of liberty on the European Continent. I care not what may have been the apprehension of France and England for their own safety in the background, they none the less assumed the burden of Belgium and began this struggle for humanity and freedom. Further, however, near or remote may have been the possibilities of danger to ourselves, it is my firm conviction that the dominating impulse of the American people is not so much their own safety as that the world shall be made safe for democracy. That the struggle will be terrific and possibly prolonged cannot be denied. The intensity of it is coming home to us more and more nearly. Autocracy will not willingly give up its power or its privileges. It is a fact of history that every step of progress for human freedom has been fought for and has been achieved only with tears and blood. Whatever the cost will be, it will not be too great. Whatever the result will be, the influence of the struggle will be only ennobling. The recognition of moral responsibility will be deepened and broadened. The nations of Europe are sobered, uplifted, spiritualized. The exaltation of sacrifice has swept through them and raised them to spiritual heights. A similar result will be seen in our own country. It is possible that there will be some small and sordid souls who will seek to secure personal advantage and selfish gain, but the people at large will feel the thrill of ennobling emotion. They will answer the impulse of unselfish sentiment and they will view life with a broader and more splendid vision. They will come to know that the public weal is larger than private advantage and that each man is his brother's keeper.

FOR A JEWISH CONGRESS IN SWITZERLAND.

A committee has been appointed in Zurich for the purpose of summoning a Jewish Congress in Switzerland. This committee has already issued a call, declaring: "Two thousand years of exile and tears are enough", and also referred to the traditional unity of the Jews in their homeland. Concerning the Russian Revolution, it says: "It brings light to humanity". The committee speaks of the propaganda which the Jews of America, Russia, Poland and other countries are carrying on for this cause, and invites all the inhabitants and organizations of Switzerland to join in this movement in order to discuss the problems of the Jewish people, and enlighten public opinion. "But this work", it continued, "can only be carried on by existence of a congress, and he who does not participate is a traitor".

Is there a thing whereof it is said: "See, this is new?"—it hath been already in the ages which were before us.—Ecclesiastes.

NEWS FROM LONDON

By Our Correspondent Dr. M. Epstein

London, Oct. 15, 1917.

The high holidays have come and gone, and the attenuated communal activities are about to recommence. This year the Eve of Atonement service in London was truly historical. The German aviators visited this city on several evenings during the week in which Yom Kippur fell, and as a raid was anticipated on Kol Nidre evening, the services in most synagogues were curtailed in order to allow congregants to return home before the raiders arrived. There can be little doubt that never before, in the whole history of Kol Nidre celebrations, has it been found necessary to alter the service on account of similar emergencies of war. In a few of the more orthodox synagogues the services continued in accordance with the ancient custom, and while the guns were giving the aerial visitors a hot time, these congregations proceeded with their solemnities in perfect calm, remaining in the synagogue until the raid was declared over. Little did the German military authorities think, when planning these exhibitions of warfare, that one effect of their action would be to dislocate the services at the synagogues on the most solemn day in the Jewish calendar. Yet so it was, and in days to come many of us will tell our grandchildren of our unique Kol Nidre experience. The curious thing is that in Germany preparations were also made in the synagogues against the possibility of air raids. In Frankfort, so it is reported from the Dutch frontier, it was decided to close the ladies' galleries in all synagogues on the New Year and the Day of Atonement because of possible danger from air attacks.

Now that the holy days are over, recruiting for the battalions for Jews is making headway. It will be remembered that according to a convention entered into between the British and the Russian governments, Russian subjects resident in this country had either to return to Russia for military service or to join the British forces here. The people affected, for the most part Jews, were thus divided into two groups, and two problems arose for the community. Those Jews who elected to return to Russia had to leave their families behind them. Those who remained here were drafted into the army, and it was for them that the special Jewish units were constituted. The two problems alluded to are obvious. On the one hand, provision had to be made for the dependents of those Russian Jews who returned to Russia; on the other, comforts had to be provided for those Russian Jews who joined our own army.

In either case, the business in hand resulted in the same policy. The community was appealed to. It is one of the wonders of the war conditions in all countries that though their pressure is hard on every class, yet appeals for distress do not fall on deaf ears. The Red Cross appeals and gets; the Y. M. C. A. appeals and gets; and these two enormous organizations are only at the head of a list of numerous lesser ones of all sorts. Jews have responded well to what may be termed general appeals, to appeals made to all citizens as citizens. But Jews have also had to bear the additional burden of providing relief for specifically Jewish cases. Both the dependents of returned Russian Jews and the Russian Jews in the British army come under the last named category, and there is little doubt that help will be forthcoming.

The families of returned Russian Jews are said to number between 600 and 800. It is possible that later on the Russian government may provide allowances for them. But in the meantime their wants must be supplied, and the work is being done by the United Russian Committee, of which Dr. D. Jochelman is the chairman. It will interest our readers to learn that Dr. Jochelman is a member of the First Lodge of England. The United Russian Committee is nothing if not original. It has organized a public meeting in aid of its funds, not in London, but in London by the sea—Brighton. Perhaps this meeing is symptomatic of the revolt of the new generation in Anglo-Jewry against the old, which came to a head recently in the purge of the Board of Deputies. At any rate, provincial English Jewries, proud of their local patriotism, are not content to look everlastingly to London for guidance. In truth, London may profit by looking at the energetic, if not always wise, action of the provincial congregations. At this Brighton meeting Mr. Zangwill is announced as the principal speaker, and we are glad to note that he is lending the weight of his influence in a good cause which is pressing.

The second problem is less pressing, but must receive attention. The Jewish units are a reality, and like other units will require what is usually termed comforts (in the larger sense). An influential committee of ladies has been formed to supervise their provision and distribution, and they have issued an appeal, for quoting which we make no apology, because in the first place it is couched in a direct, business-like, impressive style; and in the second, it may interest American Jews as well as their English brethren. Here it is:

"The battalions for Jews are in process of formation, and it is the duty of every Jew to provide them with all the necessary comforts, material and spiritual.

"We want every soldier of the battalions to feel himself in a friendly and homely atmosphere; we want him to love his camp, to be proud of his regiment, to be conscious of the fact that all Jewry is with him in his sacrifice for the united ideals of the allies and of Israel; and we want all misunderstandings to be forgotten in the common feeling that the Jew, even the wandering Jew, is as loyal a friend of Britain as Britain is of the Jew.

"We, therefore, address this appeal to all Jews and to all friends of the Jewish people, whatever their race and creed, and call on them to support the battalions with generous contributions and personal service.

"The scheme embraces material comforts for the recruits at the London Depot, as well as special huts at the Training Camp, and, later on, at the front, with provision for Kosher food. The scheme of spiritual comforts includes reading and recreation rooms at the Depot and the Training Camp, and the arrangement of lectures and concerts.

"Send knitted comforts, underwear, and toilet articles. Send furniture for the various recreation institutes. Send cigarettes and tobacco. Send instruments and music for the regimental band. Send books. We specially appeal to those who can send books in Hebrew, Yiddish, Russian and Polish. We also beg the editors of Jewish periodicals, published in whatever tongue, to send a free copy of their publications. Send names of persons, especially ladies, willing to offer their personal services. Send money.

"All contributions should be marked 'Comfort' and addressed to the Depot.

"All moneys should be made payable to Lord Rothschild.

"Help to make the Battalion a glory to Jews and a credit to Britain".

It would be surprising if there were no Jews among prisoners of war in all belligerent countries. ·What is surprising, however, is that these war prisoners are keenly interested in the Jewish revival. The Zionist Bureau at Copenhagen announces that it has received numerous applications from Jews who are prisoners of war for Hebrew and Zionist literature. In many prisoners' camps there are courses being held in Jewish History and Hebrew. All this is testimony to the vitality of the Jewish national idea, and in this country it appears to be the great issue which is stirring the Jewish community. A few years ago Zionism was an academic question; today it has become necessary to declare yourself as being either for it or against it. Public opinion in Europe has come to see that it is one of the problems that will call for solution at the end of the war. Many Jews, therefore, who are temporarily insular and narrowly patriotic, are somewhat fearful of the results. What these people do not appear to be able to see is that the twentieth century state is commonwealth of races or nations. The British Empire is perhaps one of the best illustrations of the new ideal, though the United States of America may also serve as an instance. The new Commonwealth is capable of holding together different races, each with their ideals, traditions, religions, folk-lore; each a separate, living, energetic entity, each contributing to the strength of the whole. If the professions in favor of disarmament, which even militarist Germany has found it meet to make, have any meaning, surely the Jewish ideal of brotherhood of man has been brought one step nearer realization. If the post-bellum world has room for Czechs, Serbs, Montenegrins and Finns, why should it not with equal logic find a niche for the Jews? Their history is as old, their contributions to civilization as valuable, as any of the other races and peoples just mentioned. The hope of mankind, to which President Wilson has given such noble utterances, is also the hope of the Jew. It is the hope of the Jew in that he has stood for the ideal while Europe has been painfully working up to it; it is the hope of the Jew in that he himself will benefit by its realization

These generalities have a bearing on Anglo-Jewry today. The community is strangely stirred by the national movements, and the old fashioned type of Jew, who is thoroughly patriotic, who cares for and loves the best in English life, cannot quite accommodate himself to the new possibilities. Perhaps it is that he is not sufficiently conscious of Jewish history. "My people die for lack of knowledge". Such types can be forgiven. There is hope for them, for once they appreciate the inwardness of Jewish nationalism, which is no way opposed to or in conflict with the present patriotism of groups of Jews, these men and women will form splendid elements on the side of the new stirring. At present it is impossible to tell how much they are being influenced Jewishly. But the stream of educative energy cannot remain without results. Last month we called attention in these columns to the scheme of University Extension lectures on Jewish History which the Jewish Historical Society of England has organized. The English Zionists have also inaugurated a series of lectures on "The History and Development of Zionism", to deal with the Jewish National Movement as a phase of modern Jewish History.' All this is to the good. That there is a desire for guidance on this very problem is evidenced by requests made to ministers to deal with the subject from the pulpit, and though opposing views find expression in the sermons, they cannot but tend to thought, and ultimately to decision.

An interesting expression of opinion on Zionism came recently from Dr. Treub, the Netherlands Minister of Finance. Dr. Treub is among the most intelligent of European statesmen, and his views as a rule are listened to with respect. He is very sympathetic towards the Jewish national movement, and expressed the hope that in the settlement after the war, Palestine would be allotted to the Jews. It should be borne in mind that this is the view of a statesman in whose country, as he rightly pointed out, there was no anti-semitism; in whose country Jews have always found toleration. How could it be otherwise in the commonwealth which William the Silent helped to cement?

Apart from these questionings, there is little to chronicle of the doings of Anglo-Jewry. So far as communal life is concerned, we are merely carrying on. The war calls on the energies of all citizens, and Jews readily take up their burden. Yet while in all countries and in all associations men are thinking of the problems to be faced after the war, we are afraid that there is but little thought on large questions of policy, as they will affect the life of Anglo-Jewry after the war. We are indeed considering how best the discharged soldiers can be helped when the war is over; and it is pleasing to be able to report that the London Lodge is interesting itself in the matter. But the wider aspects of communal reconstruction need attention. Everybody appears to be so busy that no one is available for specializing on this paramount problem. Had the community in olden days been a little more careful of its ministers, had their training and their status been different, it might have been possible now to charge them with this work. But most people will agree that the Anglo-Jewish ministry is hardly in a position to lead. This is wholly deplorable; and the community is but reaping as it has sown. It looks as though this key-problem is being neglected. The old men have their hands quite full; the young men are at the war. Meanwhile, synagogue attendance is dwindling; religious education is not receiving the reforms it so sadly needs; and the unbiased observer must confess that the Jewish communal ship of state is drifting aimlessly. The position is not altogether hopeless. What is lacking is a master mind to guide and inspire. What a splendid opportunity is being missed by some one!

The London Lodge is about to begin its activities again after the summer recess; and we believe it may be claimed that the members are alive to the need of the moment, and are determined, under the leadership of Brother President Gilbert, to do all they can in the circumstances to formulate the requirements of the community. A clear statement would be a help, and if the lodge should succeed in attracting attention to the great and immediate needs of the community, it will have done a piece of work very much to its credit.

RUMANIA AND THE JEWISH QUESTION.

The recent decision of the Rumanian Government definitely to grapple with the Jewish question, which has [illegible] demanding solution in that country, [illegible] to a large extent, one of the many indirect consequences of the revolution in Russia. With her great neighbor determined, once for all, to clear her records of all abuses in this connection, the position of Rumania, maintaining, as she does, anti-Semitic legislation that is almost medieval, promised to become extremely difficult, while it has, for some time past, been recognized at Jassy that, with the Jewish problem unsolved, Rumania would hold a precarious position in the great councils of settlements which much follow the war.

The only excuse for the restrictions imposed on Jews in Rumania up to the present time has been that restrictions, hardly less drastic, have been imposed on the great mass of the people. Owing to the Rumanian law, however, which forbids a Jew to hold land, his lot is a particularly hard one.

The question of reform as it affected the Jews came prominently into notice some four years ago, as the result of the extraordinary loyalty and devotion displayed by the Rumania Jews toward the close of the second Balkan war. Rumania's share in that war was confined to practically unopposed march from the Bulgaro-Rumanian frontier toward Sofia, and was a matter of only a few weeks; but that was long enough for the Jew to prove to his fellow country that he was ready to make sacrifices for his country and to show himself a devoted Rumanian citizen. As a consequence, immediately after the signing of the treaty of Bucharest the Jews were promised political equality. M. Take Jonescu, the prominent Democratic-Conservative leader, took up the matter, as did many other statesmen, with enthusiasm, and the Minister of Justice was instructed to prepare proposals for the necessary revision of the constitution. The party of reaction, however, had no intention of giving in without an effort, and every method to produce delay was resorted to. The matter, consequently, dragged on from month to month without any settlement being arrived at, and the outbreak of the European war found the problem still unsolved. In spite of these disappointments, however, when mobilization was ordered in the August of last year the Rumanian Jews once again rose to a great occasion, and since then they have distinguished themselves by many heroic deeds on the battlefield and also by the material sacrifices they have made for their country. The position, therefore, is peculiarly favorable for a settlement. Not only does the political situation urgently demand a solution, but the popular opinion that it ought to be found, and found quickly, is stronger than ever before. The authorities at Jassy would do well to hasten the matter.—Christian Science Monitor.

RUSSIAN JEWS AND THE LAND MOVEMENT.

A movement is on foot in certain Jewish quarters interested in agricultural work to secure the settlement of large numbers of Jews on the land in new Jewish colonies. The promoters urge that the Jews should raise the question at the meeting of the Constituent Assembly and request it to allot extensive tracts of land to them. The question will, no doubt, be discussed by the Russo-Jewish Congress, but the Jewish Colonization Association has also convened a conference of Jewish colonists and of those interested in the promotion of agricultural work among Jews, to consider the future of the Jewish colonies in Russia and the possibilities presented for the development of agricultural work among our co-religionists under the new regime.

The existing Jewish colonies in the South are now developing on free lines. The local Rabbis have assumed the powers which the former Government allotted to Crown Rabbis appointed by the Ministry, who generally proved to be mere bureaucratic officials. The office of the local Government Chief in each colony was abolished, and thus another source of oppression went. The colonies are now managed by elected officials.

EQUAL RIGHTS FOR ROUMANIAN JEWS.

The Russian peace program as drawn up by the Central Committee of the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates, in the form of instructions to Mr. Skobeliff, ex-minister of labor, its delegate to the Paris Conference, contains the demands that Roumania be restored on condition that she grant equal rights to Jews.

ELECTIONEERING PREACHERS.

Time and time again the question has been discussed as to the province of the pulpit in face of a division of the voters whether in city, state, or nation. If we are not mistaken, a certain vacant pulpit, which is no more vacant today, but which for a time held the stage in American Jewish life, was lost to an ambitious minister who announced that he regarded it as proper to thresh out politics in the pulpit, and that in the form of taking sides for or against a certain candidate running for office. Now it is clear that politics cannot be ruled out of the domain of the pulpit. It is eminently proper for the pulpit to take a stand in a question agitating the minds of citizens. But that must be done by indirection. The pulpit should address itself to the individual conscience. Not persons, but principles, high moral principles, should form the topic of discussion. Personalities, no matter how high, are but human, and only too often they fall from grace. Today a righteous man and a paragon of virtue, tomorrow he may be a detestable grafter. Politics is largely opportunistic. It is give and take. It must compromise. But religion is the guardian of stern uncompromisingness. The eternal verities cannot be turned and twisted to suit an occasion; the occasion must be dominated by them. We insist in this country that church and state must remain separate, and for valid reasons. If Jewish ministers indulge in prescribing to their congregations how they should vote, Catholics and Protestants of all dominations may do likewise. A good deal of it is being done, sometimes overtly, sometimes under the cloak of all sorts of innocent movements and organizations. The right-minded citizen must resent the unwarranted interference of his pastor. Least of all should we Jews tolerate that it be said of us that there is such a thing as a compact Jewish vote. We deprecate such attempts below. Yet there the people are woefully ignorant and fall easily a prey to scheming politicians. Shall we not discounteance such interferences above? We on the inside know how impotent the rabbi is in swaying the Jew on the political side. But those on the outside judge the rabbi to be a sort of pastor whose advice is sought and heeded even in civic questions. Why should Jewish citizens as Jews be advised to support this or that candidate? Just now New York is divided in a contest for the Mayoralty. By the time these lines are printed the issue will have been decided. We at a distance have no voice or judgment in the matter. In so far as a motive of more than local, nay of national, moment has been injected, we are free to express our opinion that no such motive should have ever been injected into a city campaign. We shall have it said that the issue is an importation from without, that American politics is being Russianized; and yet, just because of that criticism, it may be regarded as certain that, considering our friendly attitude to the new Russia and the fact that new Russia is a bit touchy on the subject of democracy, the wiser among us will keep silence. It must not be said that America is less democratic than Russia. At all events, we Jews as Jews should not be concerned with the issue, not even with the fact that one of the aspirants is a Jew, and that adhesion to him on the part of Jews may stir up prejudice. Jews will vote for him, and just as many will vote against him. That is to say, the Jewish citizen will exercise his right to express at the polls his individual preferences in accordance with his private judgment. That private judgment must not be tampered with by the pulpit. Suppose the rabbi's advice is not heeded, and the socialist is elected. Then the cry will go out, "The Jews have elected him". And immediately we shall have the spectre of the Jewish vote with its supposed potency to determine a national election. We all know that such power is far from being wielded by us. Jews be it said once more, may be a tool in other people's hands. Those higher up are no Jews at all. There are Jewish voters, but there is no Jewish vote. And so our advice to the pulpit for all times to come is to refrain from meddling with politics. A rabbi may with propriety appear on a public rostrum and electioneer to his heart's content. But his pulpit must be kept free from it. Is the pulpit the less free because certain wise restraints are placed upon it, or rather restraints upon the wise? By no means. No one will take from the pulpit its legitimate sphere, to stir the conscience, to review a situation from the religious and moral aspect. But the pulpit is no place for the stump speaker. The pulpit is desecrated by inviting just criticism from the other side. Least of all should Jews, high or low, be admonished to vote as a body. Remember that the rabbi is not speaking to his own congregation alone, he speaks to and in behalf of the whole congregation of Israel. The congregation of Israel must stand aloof when it comes to electing a Mayor even in the metropolis. Enough for the wise!

AN INJUDICIOUS JUDGE.

Down in the city of Philadelphia, the City of Brotherly Love, municipal government is not in best hands. What that means is only too well known to the observer of municipal and state politics throughout the land. The "interests" may be a bit annoyed at the bad name which erstwhile settlers of a more or less temporary character have fastened upon the democracy of America. We likewise resent the criticism of outsiders, who frequently have indulged in hasty generalizations and whose acquaintance with America, the great continent that stretches from ocean to ocean, is confined to East Broadway. But when we are among ourselves, we are free to confess that there is something decidedly unhealthy in our city politics. The Philadelphia administration is Republican just now, it might be Democratic. The system is controlled largely by contractors and other companies doing business with the city. The incumbent in the Mayor's chair has not thought it necessary to sever his connections with a company in which he owns the majority of the stock and which furnishes bonds to city employes. He did not see any reason why he should deprive himself of the profits of his business because, forsooth, he is the city's chief magistrate. But that is the least. The system watches over the politics of the wards, and the wards are controlled and supported by the administration. The police take a hand in the elections. Just recently in a certain ward, where the contest was close, gunmen were brought over from the Bronx and under the eyes of the police permitted to terrorize the district, with the result that a policeman was murdered. There followed an indictment of those immediately guilty and a search for those higher up. They were all brought before the bar, a certain judge sitting as committing magistrate. It happens that Jews are involved. Now we all know the type of the Jew, be he lawyer, saloonkeeper, or police lieutenant, that takes up politics as a profession. He is no better and no worse than his masters belonging to another race and another faith. We hold no brief for Jewish thugs. But when the committing judge went out of his way and in open court ventured the remark that in his experience and in that of his colleagues low Jews with Irish names are indicted for crimes which no Irishman the world over would commit, we must, to say the least, utter a protest. We protest in the first place against remarks by the bench which are injudicious. A judge's business is with the case before him, and with the facts in the case. He is sitting in judgment over individuals. He must not deal in generalizations, he must not pronounce judgment against a whole race. That is the business of the statistician out of court. We want no sermonizing in the court room. Let the pulpit attend to that need. Our courts must be kept free from all subjective partisanship. Talking to the galleries is highly offensive in a judge. On a second thought this injudicious judge made an apology, but it was worse than the original statement, for it retracted nothing, and the offensive and odious comparison was left to stand. Now we have no desire to retaliate by counter incriminations. There are good and bad Irishmen, and there are, alas, bad Jews, but also good Jews. The bad are always in the minority, though unfortunately they focus upon themselves the world's attention. Be it repeated, the Jew who is in the game of politics is no cleaner than the professional Gentile. Both constitute a sore spot in our political life. It goes without saying that in all movements which have for the aim the cleaning out of the Augean stables of city politics Jews play an important part. We have our black sheep. But we shall not allow any one to besmirch the fair name of the Jew by uncalled-for aspersions against the entire race to go unnoticed. It is undemocratic as it is untrue and unjust. If Jews have been guilty, those higher up whose tools they were are not Jews, but so-called Christians. Let condign punishment meet them all. We shall lend our hand unreservedly. But we warn that judge and his like that they must once and for all leave off untoward remarks about the Jew in general. And if suchlike persist, we shall be justified in using every means at our command to combat it. So far as the judge is concerned, we are done with him. No fair-minded American will put up with him. Let him return to the obscurity from which he was lifted for a moment. But we have also a word to say to our own. The low types are beyond our reach. But there are those semi-respectable Jews who ply their nefarious trade in city hall and in state legislature. Let them remember that they have the fair name of the Jew in their keeping. Our men of high type, who are above reproach, find only too often that traps are laid for them on all sides, so as to produce the impression that a Jew cannot be trusted to put patriotism and high civic duty above personal gain. Those will take care of themselves. Our word of warning is to the men who are less scrupulous. And we shall bring the whole weight of our influence to bear upon them, to convince them that they must put a stop to their business, or we shall put a stop to them. There must not occur another such defamation of the Jewish name.

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

Washington, D. C.

Mr. Adolf Kraus,
Pres., Independent Order of B'nai B'rith,
Chicago, Ill.

Sir:

The war demands of the departments and offices at Washington, D. C., for typewriter operators and for stenographers and typewriters are severely taxing the resources of this Commission. It is therefore requested that you assist in bringing to the attention of the public this very urgent need of the Government. The need is a vital one, for America's success in its greatest undertaking depends upon the civil service no less than upon the armed forces.

Literally thousands of typewriter operators and stenographers and typewriters, both men and women, are needed at Washington, and the call for applicants will continue for an indefinite period.

It is requested that an announcement of this need of the Government be inserted in any publication which your organization may issue; also that notices be sent to all subordinate units of the order, with the request that in each meeting room an announcement be made from the rostrum, and that the information be disseminated in any other suitable manner.

Examinations are held every Tuesday in 450 cities. Entrance salaries range from $1,000 to $1,200 a year. Promotion is reasonably rapid for those whose services prove satisfactory.

The secretary of the board of civil service examiners at the post office in any city in which city delivery of mail has been established can give further information, and persons interested may obtain application blanks and full printed instructions by writing to the Commission or to the secretary of the U. S. Board of Civil Service Examiners at Boston, Mass., New York, N. Y., Philadelphia, Pa., Atlanta, Ga., Cincinnati, Ohio, Chicago, Ill., St. Paul, Minn., St. Louis, Mo., New Orleans, La., Seattle, Wash., or San Francisco, Call.

The Commission will appreciate your assistance in this matter.

By direction of the Commission:

Very respectfully,
JOHN A. McILHENNY,
President.

RUSSIA

By Dr. Frank Crane.

Russia is the largest country in the world, territorially.

It is more than twice the size of the United States.

It occupies one-sixth of the total land area of the earth.

Its population is about 180,000,000.

Its normal increase of population is about 17 per thousand.

Seventy-five per cent of the people of Russia are engaged in agriculture.

Fifteen per cent of Russia's population live in cities. In the United States it is about 46 per cent.

In 1913 there were over 34,000 different books published in Russia; during the same year in the United States over 12,000.

Only a sixth of the children of Russia are enrolled in its schools.

Moving pictures have made rapid advances in Russia; there are over 1,500 of such places of entertainment.

Russia's national wealth is estimated at fifty billion dollars; it is thus the fifth richest nation.

There are over two million inhabitants in each of Russia's two capitals, Petrograd and Moscow.

Of Russia's 1,231 cities, 1,068 have their streets lighted at night, 162 having electric light, 128 gas and the others kerosene.

Fifty-four cities have street cars.

The five largest cities of Russia (1913), with their population in even hundred thousands, are Petrograd 2,100,000, Moscow 1,800,000, Warsaw 700,000, Odessa 600,000, Kiev 600,000.

Russia has the longest coast line of any country in the world; but most of it is locked by ice a good part of the year.

One of the most striking features of Russian economic life is the development of the co-operative movement. There are more than 37000 co-operative institutions, more than in any other country.

Russia is the most important granary of the world. In 1910, when crops everywhere were normal, it exported over 23,000,000 tons of wheat; the United States came next with 22,000,000; the world crop was 96,000,000.

The greatest tobacco growing countries are—in millions of pounds—the United States 722, British India 433 and Russia 198.

Russia raises more horses than any other country.

Russia supplies about one-third of the fur of the world.

It contains more forests than any other country.

Russia is the second petroleum producing country; the first is the United States.

Much of the business in Russia, wholesale as well as retail, is done at fairs, of which there are over 3,000 which take place annually.

The most famous fair in the world is that at Nizhni-Novgorod.

The Russian state bank is the largest bank in the world, judged by the amount of its deposits.

At the close of the war Russia will be about the most promising field in the world in which to invest capital, for it has the most tremendous possibilities.

For the above facts I am indebted to the information supplied by Mr. Leo Pasvolsky, editor of the Russian World. —The New York Globe.

ROUMANIAN JEWS IN AUSTRIA.

The Ruthenian deputy in the Austrian Parliament recently attacked the Austrian Government for countenancing the persecution of Roumanian Jews in Austria by petty officials. He pointed out that many of these Jews had been living in Austria for many years and that their sons are now fighting in the Austrian armies, and still the government has exiled many of these Jews and also introduced many discriminating laws against them in the empire. The deputy produced facts and figures in corroboration of his plea and his address made a strong impression upon Parliament.

SHOCHETIM AND MILITARY SERVICE IN HUNGARY.

A representative deputation of Rabbis and communal leaders has presented a memorial to the Hungarian Minister of Defence against the proposed enrollment of the Shochetim (who have hitherto been exempted) into the army. At first the minister was unfavorably inclined towards the petition, but when he heard that it was only a question of gaining a few hundred soldiers, that the process of learning a Schochet's duties was a long one, and also that the enlistment of Shochetim would prove a disaster to the communities, he promised to reconsider the question with his colleagues.

POLAND AND LITHUANIA IN DESPERATE PLIGHT.

People are literally dying of starvation in the streets of Warsaw and other cities of Poland and Lithuania and only concerted action on the part of America, along the lines similar to those pursued for the rescue of Belgium, can stay the ravages of hunger and disease which is already collecting a horrible toll in these two countries.

Unless prompt and energetic measures are taken, the situation is hopeless.

This information is contained in a cable message from the American Legation at Copenhagen through Secretary of State Lansing to the Provisional Executive Committee for General Zionist Affairs, informing that organization of the arrival, in Copenhagen, of a special commission from the municipality of Warsaw, for the express purpose of appealing to President Wilson to issue a special appeal to the American people on behalf of the stricken peoples of Poland and Lithuania.

The commission consists of Dr. Yechiel Tchlenow, president of the Russian Zionist Federation, Chief Rabbi Simonson of Denmark, and Shabsel Farbstein, head of the Warsaw Jewish community, who make their appeal for the Christian as well as the Jewish population of these countries, all classes suffering alike.

The cablegram from the American legation reads:

"There has arrived here a special mission from the municipality of Warsaw to obtain foodstuffs for the Christian and Jewish population of Poland and Lithuania. The mission, which consists of Tchlenow, Simonson and Farbstein, report that the position in those countries is desperate. Mortality from diseases and epidemics is progressing horribly. There are frequent instances of old men and women and of young children dying on the streets from starvation. Even the families of soldiers fighting in the ranks of the entente armies suffer great misery.

"The only thing that can save the population of Poland and Lithuania is the creation of a relief action similar to that taken in behalf of Belgium. The humane feelings of the noble American people and of their great President is the last hope of this helpless, starving people, whom it implores shall treat them as they treat the Belgians.

"The commission hopes to secure from the entente the necessary guarantees which will enable the American people to send relief, and states that it has prospects of securing the necessary tonnage to bring salvation to them. It asks the Provisional Zionist Committee to inform President Wilson, in whose hands rests the fate of millions of human beings in Poland and Lithuania, of the conditions prevailing there and to secure his consent, in principle, to the proposed relief action".

The Provisional Zionist Committee is taking the necessary steps to place its information before President Wilson.

JEWS IN THE AUSTRIAN PARLIAMENT.

The Austrian Jews have had several unpleasant experiences recently in the Reichsrat, several attacks having been made against them by deputies. The Polish anti-Semites urged the ministry to compile statistics of the military efforts made by each nationality and creed in Austria, in order, as they hope, to discredit the Jews for their alleged "insufficient response and lack of enthusiasm for field service". Deputy Dr. Straucher delivered an eloquent address proving that the Austrian Jews have done their duty, and that in the tenth Izonzo battle Jews greatly distinguished themselves. The Austrian Jewish newspapers also printed a long list containing 477 names of recently decorated Jewish officers, soldiers and doctors for bravery at the front. The list also includes the name of the First Flight Lieutenant Sack, the son of the deceased rabbi of Semichov, who obtained ten decorations and the first class of the Iron Cross.

Deputy Straucher introduced an interpellation into the Austrian parliament concerning the continued imprisonment of the Jew, Hilsner, on the accusation of having committed an alleged ritual murder.

FIRE AT A VIENNA SYNAGOGUE.

The largest synagogue in Vienna, the one in the Tempelgasse, Leopoldstadt, has been severely damaged by fire. One side of the structure has been completely destroyed. The scrolls of the law and the sacred appurtenances were, however, saved. While the fire was in progress the governor, the commandant, the chief of police and the burgomaster of Vienna proceeded to the spot and tendered their condolences to the secretary of the Jewish community. Steps have already been taken to restore the synagogue.

THE JEWISH SCHOOLS IN BAGDAD REOPEN.

The occupancy of Bagdad by General Maude's army has made possible the reopening of the Jewish schools in the capital of Mesopotamia, and the Zionist Publicity Department has just received an interesting and detailed report of these institutions written by a distinguished American resident of that city.

Although the Girls' School is attended by 1,100 Jewish children, there are about 2,000 girls for whom no accommodations are available. The old, oriental idea that girls may be neglected while every stress is laid on the education of boys, is gradually disappearing in Bagdad. The "shut out" girls are clamorous for school accommodation and there would not be a single "slacker" among the entire number if room could be found for them.

The 1,100 girls for whom there is accommodation are housed in a splendid building erected several years ago by Mme. Laura Khadourie, of India, at a cost of 10,000 pounds sterling, and is regarded as one of the finest edifices and most beautiful institutions in the city.

Thirteen hundred boys are pupils at the Albert Sassoon School, which is under the direction of Mr. J. Bassan, whose wife is directress of the girls' school. Both of these institutions are supported by the Alliance Israelite Universelle; but since the war the income of this organization—coming mainly from London and Paris—has fallen off, and the schools have suffered in consequence. All pupils who are able pay for tuition, but the income from this source is very small.

A local philanthropist, Menahem S. Daniel, maintains a school for poor children, which is attended by 160 girls and 140 boys. About one-half of these children who attend the school, which is located in the former home of Mr. Daniel's father, receive clothing and one meal a day free.

In addition to these two institutions, there is the Community School, with 2,300 boys from the poorest class, who receive one free meal a day. Some of the children are given clothing. This school needs a thorough reorganization. The community is not able to raise adequate funds; the teaching facilities and methods are very antiquated and the building itself presents a very disheveled appearance.

Since the advent of the British forces, the school children, in all of the institutions, have manifested a strong desire to learn the English language. American school teachers would be especially welcomed, owing to the reputation which the American schools in Constantinople, Beirut and Asia Minor have won in the Orient. Mme. Bassan would especially welcome the co-operation of a Jewish young woman who holds a teacher's license from any part of the United States. The children in Mr. Daniel's school have already taken up the study of English and their progress in a very short time is described as astonishing.

ENGLAND DECLARES OFFICIALLY IN FAVOR OF THE ZIONIST MOVEMENT.

Great Britiain has finally uttered a fateful word, which is the realization of the great hope that has lived in the heart of the Jew and has sustained him through the centuries.

It has officially declared itself in favor of the Zionist Movement and the establishment of Palestine as a national home for the Jewish people.

Arthur J. Balfour, Secretary of the State for Foreign Affairs, has written the following letter to Lord Rothschild, expressing the Government's sympathy with the Zionist Movement:

"'The Government views with favor the establishment of Palestine as a national home for the Jewish people, and will use their best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing will be done that may prejudice the civil or religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine'.

"Mr. Balfour adds that this declaration of sympathy with the Jewish Zionist aspirations has been submitted to and approved by the Cabinet".

OFFER OF A JEWISH LEGION IN RUSSIA.

A number of Jews have submitted a memorial to the Ministry of War urging it to organize a Jewish legion to fight against Germany. The memorialists expressed the fear that a German victory would lead to the re-introduction of the old regime, which, as Jews, they were most anxious to obviate; hence they offered their lives for the cause of Free Russia.

ANTI-JEWISH PREJUDICE IN RUSSIA.

Immediately after the Revolution State posts were not only thrown open to Jews, but those in authority who had to find suitable officials for the Republican regime very often went out of their way to induce Jews to accept office. Many rejected the honor, even then believing that they would serve Jewish interests better by remaining in unofficial obscurity. The Railway Congress which has just been held at Kharkoff revealed the fact that in the Department of Ways and Communications the same anti-Semitic prejudice is spreading as that which led to the resignation of the Jewish employes at the Odessa postal and telegraph offices. The Congress expressed its profound regret that excuses were again being found to prevent Jews from obtaining employment on the railways, although work was more plentiful than ever and labor was very scarce.

In the province of Bessarabia, plots of German colonists, in conjunction with officials of the old regime, were discovered against Jews and the Republic.

At Pavlovsk, after prolonged trouble, order has been restored by the continued display of military force in the streets. Jews who spent many sleepless nights at the railway station are now resuming normal work. The pogrom agitation was commenced by refugees from Petrograd, who accused the Jews of the shooting affrays here and of complicity in the Maximalist plots. The anti-Semites demanded a crusade against the Jews as a means of restoring "the Tsar and order".

The Municipalities of Petrograd and Moscow have issued strong appeals to the population to counteract the pogrom movements, and to regard the Jews as brethren. A similar manifesto was issued by the Ukraine Central Council against the work of the Kieff Black Hundreds.

THE JEWS AND TURKEY.

The Jewish Correspondence Bureau in The Hague reports:

"Milli's Agency is spreading the report that the Jews in Palestine are being treated with the greatest friendliness, that the Jews of the whole world recognize this, and that in Turkey the Jews have always enjoyed absolute liberty and were warmly received.

"This report is strongly biased and is not founded on truth. The facts have proved the contrary, and the official documents, which were published by the Jewish Correspondence Bureau a short time ago, have plainly shown how a systematic campaign has been led against the Jews in Palestine since the commencement of the war. It is particularly the Zionists who are persecuted by the authorities. The Government has forbidden in a special address all participation in Zionist work and attendance at Zionist meetings, dissolved societies, placed the death penalty on the use of Jewish national signs, as stamps and flags, disarmed Jewish colonists, dissolved the Jewish organizations of watchmen who protected the colonies from the attacks of Arabs. Already at the beginning of the war Zionist leaders, heads of schools, banks, leaders of the labor party, etc., were banished. The evacuation of Jaffa has again demonstrated that the Government appears decided to destroy the Jewish work there. It is true the reports in the Entente press were exaggerated. Massacres of Jews have never taken place. Refugees from Palestine, who have gone to America via Switzerland related that they were well treated. In this time it was announced that Jews had been hanged. This rumor, too, was cleared up by the refugees. Tens of Arabians were hanged for desertion and Jews who refused to serve shared the same fate. True it is only—and this is confirmed from a German source—that the Jews were evacuated from Jaffa, the German general on the Turkish general staff not perceiving any military reason for this step—as the German, M. P. Cohn, declared in the Reichstag. It is also true that the deportation of Jewish notables—from Jerusalem, too—continues. Many families are even banished from the whole of Turkey. The eighty-year-old Hebrew writer and leader of the Union of Teachers, David Yellin, has been deported to Damascus".

ENLISTMENT OF JEWS IN CANADA.

It is stated on reliable authority that enlistments among the non-alient Jewish population number about 2,000, or about 5 per cent of the entire number of Jews of Canadian birth and citizenship. This proportion compares with 4 per cent for the general population.

THE SOLDIER JEW.

It is a foregone conclusion that the Jews as law-abiding citizens furnished their proportionate quota on Registration Day. Neither does it suffer the slightest doubt that, as good patriots and in gratitude for having found here a place of safety against the hatred of their brutal enemies, the native and foreign-born Jews were no slackers in subscribing for the Liberty Loan. But how many of them will appear in khaki? How will they behave in the trenches? How many will return with the war medal pinned to their breasts?

There is yet insufficient authentic material on the part played by the Jews in the present war, but the records of the past are known.

The Old Testament is, fortunately, still a very accessible and pretty well known book. Therefore why waste space and time in proving that the old Hebrews, under Joshua, their judges and kings, were valorous warriors before the Lord? And who does not know the story of the Maccabees and the desperate defense of Jerusalem against the powerful legions of Vespasian and Titus in the year 70 A. D.? Who is not acquainted with the heroic stand of Bar Kokba, the Hebrew Garibaldi, and his followers at Bethar 135 A. D.? But probably very few readers will know that the Jews were not only brave soldiers in their own country, but that the martial fever drove thousands of them to serve as volunteers in the armies of Alexander the Great 356-323 B. C.), and of the Syrian kings; that Ptolemy I of Egypt (323-309 B. C. employed them in preference as garrison troops in his fortified places, thu recognizing at the same time their bravery and loyalty.

Ptolemy Philometor (died 145 B. C. and his queen, Cleopatra, committe their whole kingdom to the two Jewis generals, Orias and Dositheus, for the were the only ones in the whole army o whom they could implicitly rely. Tw other Hebrew generals, Helgias an Ananias, saved the same queen's thron from the onslaughts of her own sor Ptolemy Lathyrus.

He who desires to read the story i detail is referred to the works of th famous Judeo-Roman historian, Josephu Flavius (37-95 A. D.)

Even Julius Caesar was obliged t speak in terms of high praise of th valor displayed by the 1,500 Jewish soldiers engaged in his wars against Egyp and Mithridates of Pergamon. Hero helped Mark Antony with five Jewis cohorts.

But who, unless he made a specia study of the subject, would dream o looking for sturdy Jewish warriors in th Arabia of Mahomet? It is, nevertheless a fact that, when the prophet came t Medina, he found the whole country ful of Jews ready to resist him, arms i hand. He tried to make of them his allies, but they refused.

About 100 years later (1742-1743) Rabbi Jonathan Eibenschuetz, a famou Talmudical scholar, together with othe rabbis of the Bohemian capital, stood o the walls encouraging their co-religionists to defend the city against the attack of the French army.

When, in 1794, the population of Warsaw rose in arms, a whole Jewish regiment, under its own colonel, of the name of Berko, was fighting in the suburb of Praga against the Russian general, Suwarow.

Jewish sailors in the Dutch navy excelled in courage in the conquest of Brazil.

And now to come to this country. There was only a handful of them in the time of the Revolutionary War. But the names of forty six Jewish soldiers are known, twenty-four of them being officers. Colonel Isaac Franks and Colonel David Salisbury Franks occupy a place of honor in the military history of our country.

Brigadier General Joseph Bloomfield and eight other Jewish officers distinguished themselves in the War of 1812.

The American navy carries on its roll of honor the names of Commodore Uriah Phillips Levy, Captain Levi Myers and Commander Adolf Marix.

Throughout the Civil War Jewish patriotism and gallantry shone out most brilliantly: 7,878 Jews out of a total population of 150,000 were found on either of the two sides.—New York Tribune.

THE STAGE AND THE JEW

Do You Know That—

most of the world's greatest actors and actresses are Jews? Do you know that some of the most famous playwrights, managers and producers are Jewish? If you doubt the above, read the following list and be convinced that you will find the Jews leading in "character" work, comedy, tragedy, farce, burlesque, musical comedy and vaudeville. There are the famous French women, Sarah Bernhardt, Rachel, Judith and Madame Simone. Miss Minnie Seligman, Madame Nazimova and Rose Eytinge. Miss Constance Collier, in "Peter Ibbetson," and Clara Lipman, wife of Louis Mann, are very capable actresses. Then there is Madame Bertha Kalich, the famous vaudevillians, Nora Bayes and the Dolly Sisters, "headliners". Miss Fanny Brice, Miss Natalie Alt, David Warfield, Louis Mann, Lewis Morrison, Weber and Fields, Sam Bernard, Barney Bernard. the Howard Brothers, Robert Warwick, "Al" Jolson, "Bobby" North, Sir Herbert Tree, Florence Reed, William Norris, Roger Brothers, Julia Neilson, are all Jewish.

Among some of the Jewish playwrights we have Henri Bernstein, Charles Klein, Sydney Rosenfeld, Maurice V. Samuels, Dr. Louis K. Anspacher, Israel Zangwill, Abraham Schomer, Max Marcin, Jules Eckert Goodman and many others.

A few Jewish managers and producers are: Charles Frohman, Daniel Frohman, "Flo" Ziegfield, Sam Harris, Al Woods, Liebler, Alfred Hayman, William Harris, Marc Klaw, A. H. Erlanger, David Belasco the Selwyns and Oscar Hammerstein.

Where would the stage be today if it were not for the Jewish actors, playwrights and managers?—The Argus.

Thoughts and Tidings—Review of Passing Events

By H. Eliassof

Is Kerensky a Jew?

A short time ago the story came to our shores that Kerensky, the man of the hour in the new life of Russia, is a Jew. The story reached America simultaneously with the report that the Leninites and the Black Hundreds have joined hands and are agitating for pogroms against the Jews. The American daily papers readily picked up this sensational piece of news and spread it broadcast over the land. The American Jewish press naturally fell upon it as upon a treasure-trove and exploited it to the fullest extent. Some Jewish journals even discovered a number of Jews and Jewesses in several American cities who claimed relationship with the Russian Premier and related incidents from their childhood days away back in Russia in which Kerensky figured as one of their family. But in spite of all these multifarious endeavors to plant an affirmation of the story in the minds of the people, it found no fertile soil and failed to take root. There were too many doubters and the story was dead and buried as suddenly as it had come to life. A big black question mark now adorns its grave, inviting the passer-by to find the true answer to the query: "Is Kerensky a Jew?" I think the answer can easily be given. It is to be found in the words of Horace, the Latin poet, which read as follows: "Mutato nomine de te fabula narratur", change but the name, the tale is told of you. Change the name of Kerensky to the Jews and it becomes plain enough at whom this Kerensky story was aimed. Of course, it was a pure fabrication launched into the world by the combination of the evil forces, the reactionary elements of Russia, who are trying hard to destroy the provisional government and believe that by destroying the Jews they will quickly accomplish their nefarious aim. The same cowardly cohorts who have raised the cry that the Jews of Russia, who are among the stanchest supporters of the provisional government, have taken possession of everything, have also invented the sensational story that Kerensky is a Jew for the sinister purpose of proving their malicious accusations against the Jews.

Those who are well acquainted with the present chaotic conditions in Russia and are fully aware of the foul means which the turbulent reactionaries are employing for their vile purposes, could easily see the earmarks of treachery in the fraudulent tale; they detected at once its connection with the reports of the domination of the Jews in Russian public affairs, as well as with the pogrom propaganda, they soon divined the polluted source whence it emanated and wisely doubted the veracity of the Kerensky story from beginning to end.

In the meantime Mr. Herman Bernstein, the editor of the "American Hebrew" of New York, returned from his journey to Russia, where he had observed things from the vantage ground of truth and in a strong, convincing editorial in his paper he removed the last prop from under the shaky Kerensky story. In this editorial he made among others the following impressive statements:

"The extreme radicals, the Maximalists, are working hand in hand with the extreme reactionaries, the former Black Hundreds, who are now masquerading as revolutionists. During the July Maximalist riots in Petrograd, the headquarters of the Russian I. W. W., led by Lenine, whose real name is Ulyanov, and who is a member of an old aristocratic Russian family, was searched by the troops loyal to the provisional government. Among the incriminating documents that were found there was a large supply of pamphlets and postcards concerning ritual murder and other pogrom propaganda. Everybody in Russia knows that nothing would help the apostles of unrest and dissension more than a Jewish massacre, for this would bring all the anti-government elements together and strengthen their hands against the sane leaders who are bravely and heroically fighting to save Russian liberty from the hands of those who are seeking to destroy it".

After taking the so-called American newspaper correspondents severely to task for having taken up the work which the "Novoye Vremya" used to do before the revolution and for carrying on in American newspapers the campaign of falsehoods conducted against the Jews under the old Russian regime, inciting massacres and spreading race hatred, Mr. Bernstein continues:

"Other correspondents hold the Jewish people responsible for the Maximalist movement in Russia, declaring that most of them are Jews. Some correspondents have even converted Lenine to Judaism for mysterious purposes. Others are circulating the story that Kerensky is a Jew in the hope of destroying his influence in Russia, of inciting race hatred against him, of spreading the pogram fever in Russia in order to overthrow the provisional government headed by Kerensky".

The "London Jewish Chronicle," which is nearer to Russia than our newspapers, also stated as follows in a recent number:

"The Leninites—the very party which is attacked as Jew-inspired and Jew-ridden—are manifesting violent ill-feeling against our coreligionists, and at the other end of the scale traditional Jew-baiters of the old regime, the reactionaries, are raising their heads once again, using the ancient methods of the blood-legend and detecting in the old expedient of Jew-hatred an invaluable weapon for a counter revolution. We have no desire whatever to exaggerate these portraits; but neither would it be wise to minimize their significance".

The wise words of Thomas Carlyle which he expressed in his celebrated work, "The History of the French Revolution", in regard to the rise of the improvised Commune just before the awful days of terror, are also applicable to the Russian revolution in its present chaotic state. Carlyle states: "Very frightful it is when a nation, rending asunder its constitutions and regulations which were grown dead cerements for it, becomes transcendental; and must now seek its wild way through the New Chaotic—where force is not distinguished into Bidden and Forbidden, but Crime and Virtue welter unseparated—in that domain of what is called Passions, of what we call the Miracles and the Portents".

Revolutionary Russia, which has just freed itself from the nightmare of czardom, from the darkness of despotism and from the chains of oppression, and is struggling for light and liberty, for law and order and for right and justice, is also passing through the dangerous period where "force is not distinguished into Bidden and Forbidden, where Crime and Virtue welter unseparable". It requires great clear-sightedness, indomitable will-power and boundless determination on the part of captain and crew to keep the ship of state on the right course and to steer it safely past the rugged rocks which threaten destruction, into free and open waters. The Jews of Russia, alas, have the hardest road to travel. While they must support the provisional government with their full strength and vigor in order to help to safeguard the interests of their country, they are also forced to shield themselves against the spontaneous combustion of the mass of inflammable matter which has remained in Russia from the days of torturing tyranny and which may at any moment again burst into a consuming conflagration and ravage all their long-hoped-for, wept-for and suffered-for liberty; aye, even destroy their almost crushed lives. They must guard themselves against giving offense to either of the conflicting political factions of the day. So they stand between many fires and must try to tread their way with almost superhuman precaution in order to avoid the innumerable snares which are incessantly placed on their path and to escape unscathed from all their perplexing predicaments.

But the Russian Jews are strong in their faith in the God of their fathers and are confident that He will not forsake them. They do their duty as newly made citizens unflinchingly and their coreligionists in America must encourage them to continue to do so.

AMERICAN JEWISH HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

The twenty-sixth annual meeting of the American Jewish Historical Society will be held in the city of Philadelphia, on Feb. 11 and 12, 1918. All persons intending to present papers at this meeting are requested to send the exact titles thereof to the corresponding secretary not later than Jan. 5, 1918. Attention is directed to the fact that papers are not limited in treatment and subject-matter to American Jewish history, but that the object of the Society includes the promotion of the study of Jewish history in general.

ALBERT M. FRIEDENBERG.
Corresponding Secretary.
38 Park Row, New York.

By work one accustoms one's self to a severe and active life, and the character gains as much by it as the mind.—Ozanam.

REVEREND DOCTOR J. LEONARD LEVY'S LAST MESSAGE TO HIS PEOPLE.

I desire to place before you two pictures. One is so sad that my heart quivers with grief as I draw its outlines. None but a Jeremiah has the ability to paint it in all its details. If you were to see the model from which the picture is taken, your faces might become like the countenance of Dante, of whom the children of Italy used to say, "There goes the man who has seen Hell". It is drawn on a canvas as large as Eastern Europe, including Poland, Galicia, Roumania, Russia; and it must be lengthened to cover parts of the Turks' country, ancient and modern, including the land made sacred to us because our masters the Prophets of Israel immortalized it.

The background of that picture shows ruined cities, devastated towns, villages mingled with the soil. Factories are heaps of rubbish; the fair products of civilization—art galleries, churches, school-houses, municipal buildings, hospitals—lie battered beyond recognition. The fair earth whose smiling surface bore crops in plenty is wrinkled with graves. Vultures fly where, a few years ago, the patient herds wound slowly over verdant meads and vales. Charred masses lie athward the ground which, but yesterday, was adorned by forest giants which had withstood the storms of ages. On all sides the work of death and destruction is complete. A modern Necropolis marks the territory which a little while ago was the abode of prosperity, plenty and peace.

In the center of the picture we see piles of bodies awaiting burial. They have fallen in war. They have been sacrificed to the brutal god, Mars. They have gone to their long rest, after slow starvation. Their pinched and wan faces, their bare bodies, their sunken cheeks, their emaciated limbs, tell of suffering which none can describe. They are the mortal remains of old men and women, of young men and maidens, of little boys and girls—a holocaust offered on the pitiless altar of human madness.

In the foreground of this picture we see thin and trembling hands outstretched for bread. Hands, did I say? I mean the bony digits of what once were plump and powerful hands. As we follow these misshapen masses and look at their possessors, our humane sentiments are touched to the quick. We see the gaunt faces of starved men and women, living skeletons, reduced to the verge of feebleness and exhaustion for want of food, which a few pennies might purchase, but the pennies are lacking. A once prosperous series of communities are reduced to beggary. Little babes seek nourishment from the dried breasts of starving motherhood. In the midst of bitter winter and in Eastern Europe the winters are always bitter—bodies are almost naked, feet are unshod, heads are uncovered. Several millions of hitherto self-supporting people are in the danger zone into which death, with impartial foot, enters unbid.

This is a feeble and faint impression of the conditions which confront millions of those bound to us by ties of a common past, a common faith, a common heritage, a common blood. For them we plead tonight, because if we are not to be their physical support, they will soon be numbered with the unaccountable dead. For the moment, let us turn from this sad, sorrowful and sickening picture and gaze on the second I would I had the ability adequately to paint.

We see before our mental eye a canvas stretching from ocean to ocean, from lakes to Gulf. All is serenely beautiful in the background, calmly prosperous in the central portion of the picture, tranquilly progressive in the foreground. Here health and happiness reign supreme. Want is banished by the hand of industry, need has disappeared before the bounty of Nature's God. A hundred million men, women and children enjoy plenty. The air is vocal with the sounds of humming industry. The fields lie waiting to receive the precious seed the harvest of which will feed untold millions.

Among those ten times ten millions of happy people, two millions of Jews dwell. They enjoy liberty and life, unhampered. They are in the possession of every human right which a just government can ensure for its citizens. Some serve in high places. Some are greatly honored of their fellow-citizens. Some enjoy the privileges of exalted social position. Some are blessed with vast possessions, the security of which is guaranteed by the righteous laws of a free people. All may go to rest each night in the enjoyment of the knowledge that life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness are guaranteed to them and that the fruit of their honest toil will be conserved for the coming generations. The smile of peace is on their face. The joy of undisturbed domestic happiness is their treasured possession. V[illegible] say unto you, a Land of Pr[illegible] them, a land upon which the eyes [illegible] Lord look in love, a land wh[illegible] guards from the beginning of [illegible] till the end of the same.

The stricken ones of the first [illegible] in this modern reign of terror, [illegible] their brethren in America for help. None but those Jews who are in this blessed land can serve the cause in behalf of which we are met. The Jews of the belligerent lands are compelled by the force of circumstances to help the poor in their own countries and have but little for those of other lands. The Jews of America, blessed with abundance, must heed the cry of the starving, or their death will be on our souls.

Never, since the Jews have dispersed, two thousand years ago, has a cause been presented for the helpful consideration of the Jews in free lands comparable with this. We are not asking for the means of rehabilitation. We ask for bread for starving men, women and children. The sorrows of the ages are dwarfed by the pangs and pain of today. Ten million dollars will be needed to supply the barest necessities of life to the stricken multitudes. Who with a heart of pity, who with bowels of mercy, can refuse to heed the cry of food which goes up in the regions devastated, disfigured and destroyed by war? Who, enjoying plenty, will withhold his share, when he knows that twenty-five cents a week will mean the salvation of a human life"?

The Jewish heart is tender. Our rabbis tell us that the sons and daughters of Israel are recognized by three characteristics, Charity, Benevolence, Beneficence.

Suffering has made the heart merciful, as one common touch of persecution has made the whole people kin. Once the world called after us "Hep! Hep!" Our brethren now cry to us, "Help! Help!" Can we turn deaf ears to their cry? If we do, can we maintain our self-respect? In the end, we must leave everything we possess behind us. Nothing will help but the good we have done when opportunity served. Heaven, says a friend of mine, is the place where a man or women is surrounded by the benedictions of those he has served; Hell is the place where the pointing bony fingers of the gaunt and starving drive the iron, white-heated, into the soul of a man who, though able, refuses to relieve human distress. The opportunity to gain such a heaven and to avoid such a Hell is yours in this day when, on the altar of sacrifice we must place our offering in the name of God for the service of man. What shall it profit a man if he saves his money and know that, by his frugality or parsimony, a human soul has been lost?

LUZZATTI FOR A JEWISH PALESTINE.

The Jewish Correspondence Bureau in The Hague has learned from a reliable source, the late prime minister of Italy, Luzzatti, has been asked by Baron Edmund Rothschild of Paris what his attitude towards the idea of a Jewish state in Palestine is, or rather how he imagines such a state should be founded. The Italian diplomat answered that owing to his position he could not give any definite assurances or opinions on the question, but that he was decidedly in favor of a Jewish center in Palestine under the control of the Allies. He had also reason to think that such a solution of the Jewish question would meet with the approval of the Powers.

The Bureau has learned further that Luzzatti declared to a well known leader of Roumanian Jewry that the Roumanian Jewish question was the knotty point of the Jewish problem. The Roumanian Government doggedly persisted in shunning a complete and honest solution of the Jewish question and was carrying on a strange policy of deception to this end. As yet it had been impossible to move the Roumanian authorities to make a binding promise and it would probably be necessary for Roumania's Allies to exert pressure on the latter country to effect its solution.

PROTEST AGAINST PERSECUTION OF ROUMANIAN JEWS.

The Ruthenian deputy in the Austrian Parliament recently attacked the Austrian government for countenancing the persecution of the Roumanian Jews in Austria by petty officials. He pointed out that many of these Jews had been living in Austria for many years and that their sons are now fighting in the Austrian armies, and still the government has exiled many of these Jews and also introduced many discriminating laws against them in the empire. The deputy produced facts and figures in corroboration of his plea and his address made a strong impression upon Parliament.

THE AMERICAN SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' WELFARE LEAGUE OF THE INDEPENDENT ORDER OF B'NAI B'RITH

The work of the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League has grown apace. The headquarters that have been established have filled a need, and the comments on the work done by our directors, by the men in uniform themselves and their visitors, have been uniformly favorable. A young man at Ft. Logan in Houston writes to his mother that he not only enjoys the work, "but thinks the world of the worker". Another writes: "I can safely take it upon myself to act as spokesman for the Jewish soldiers in wishing the I. O. B. B. success and good luck in their new venture, and when this war for democracy is over, and in later years when the new generation reads about it, the Jew will have his rightful place in American history, and have done his share in overthrowing autocracy and making the world safe for democracy". Another young man speaking of visiting his brother-in-law at Camp Grant, stated: "If our Jewish friends could see this magnificent club room and its fine facilities, you could not keep them from contributing to its upkeep". Another observer from another camp writes: "Your director understands the great work before him, and he is carrying out his duties to the full satisfaction of everybody. The Jewish boys in the camp are very much pleased with the treatment accorded them at our headqarters". And still another writes: "Let me assure you that the boys at our camp are pretty well taken care of, and certainly appreciate the efforts in their behalf". The Managing Board feels that these letters, unsought for as they were, bear some evidence that our work is not only desired but needed.

Since the last issue of the B'nai B'rith News, the work at our different headquarters has grown in extent. Our local directors have gained in experience and the communities in which our club rooms are located have come to look upon them as centers for all kinds of activities pertaining to the welfare of our soldiers. Clubs have been formed for the entertaining of soldiers; knitting organizations have been formed for them; dramatic societies have sprung up, and a patriotic and loyal feeling for our country and its defenders has shown itself in many different ways. Religious organizations have sprung up, and one of our workers holds weekly services for the Jewish people of the city near which a cantonment, of which he is our director, is located. A glimpse of the work that our workers are doing can best be had by reading from the weekly reports sent in by the directors of the various headquarters which we have established.

Camp Dodge, Des Moines, Iowa.

On the 28th of October a smoker and house warming was held in our headquarters. There were about eighty men in uniform present, both officers and privates. We had a musical program and addresses. A feature of the evening was a vocal solo by Private Phillip Block of Duluth, formerly a cantor. Mr. Block also at another time officiated at one of the synagogues and pleased his hearers very much.

Private H. H. Epstein, of Minneapolis, gave a reading, and Sergeant Bellis, of St. Paul, gave a vocal solo. Rabbis Manheimer and Cohen delivered addresses, after which an athletic exhibition was put on by Privates Labe Saffro and S. H. Jester. The welcome given to the boys was one which a soldier said "he could never forget". Refreshments were served after the program was completed, and the citizens of Des Moines testify that this was one of the most enjoyable affairs recently given in that city.

The director of the club rooms in Des Moines, Mr. Joseph A. Wolf, and his committee are planning other affairs. The Jewish population of Des Moines has become enthusiastic in the work, and it is safe to say that the suggestion of Secretary Baker is being followed scrupulously to the end that the Jewish boys in Camp Dodge may make better and more efficient soldiers.

Camp Custer, Battle Creek, Mich.

The whole state of Michigan has formed itself into a branch of the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League. Every I. O. B. B. lodge has representatives on the Executive Committee of this branch, and Hon. Samuel Foltz, postmaster of Kalamazoo, is the chairman. Our worker there is Mr. Edgar J. Drachman, of New York. Mr. Drachman not only visits the boys at the camps, attends to the sick and to the soldiers in distress, but he has organized the Battle Creek community into a congregation, and holds services for them. The Jewish Ladies' Auxiliary Society has arranged an entertainment for the boys for Nov. 18. A soldier who had become sick needed help and our director came to his succor. This is the third case of distress that has come to the notice of the work at Camp Custer. Mr. Drachman is in touch with the Jewish inhabitants of a number of towns in Michigan, and also with the rabbis of the state, and he calls upon these to help entertain the men in uniform whenever possible.

The Battle Creek headquarters have not yet been formally dedicated, but plans to that end are being worked out.

Camp Logan, Houston, Texas.

Mr. Bernard Freefield, our director in Houston, reports that he has called on a number of Chicago boys whose parents have requested that he visit them. He is now taking a census of the Jewish boys in an effort to ascertain whether any of them are in need of anything in the way of apparel which their parents and friends may furnish them. Within the last few days three parties have called up our Chicago office asking us to make inquiries through our workers in Houston for men in whom they are interested. Our worker reports that one of our boys has been taken ill with tuberculosis and he has gotten in touch with the local organization in Houston, which is looking after his immediate wants, supplementing the regular hospital treatment in those little ways in which the sick can always be made happy and cheerful.

In a report before us from Houston we find that four entertainments were given within a fortnight for the Jewish soldiers; meetings were held with the Jewish officers of Camp Logan, and representatives for every company appointed to co-operate with our director. Personal calls were made on a large number of Jewish citizens with regard to interesting them in soldier work. During the week ending Nov. 3 some 175 Jewish men attended the halls. Personal interviews with 28 soldiers were held concerning their welfare. Nine hundred and fifty pieces of literature were given out to the Jewish men through the director and his camp assistants.

Houston has given the Jewish boys a royal welcome and letters from them testify to their appreciation of all that is being done for them.

Camp Shelby, Hattiesburg, Miss.

On Sunday afternoon, Oct. 21, there occurred the dedication of the Hattiesburg Community Hall for Soldiers. This community hall is maintained by the Hattiesburg Branch of the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League of the I. O. B. B. A large audience greeted the speakers, among whom were Judge N. C. Hill, Major Jackson Morris and Dr. Mendel Silber, of New Orleans.

Mr. Herman Katz, executive secretary of the Hattiesburg branch of the league, acted as master of ceremonies. The program was interspersed with musical numbers. Judge Hill complimented the Jews of Hattiesburg and the B'nai B'rith upon the enterprise shown in the work which the Hattiesburg branch is doing. He extended in behalf of the community a cordial welcome to the men of Camp Shelby to come to Hattiesburg. Major Morris delivered a stirring and patriotic address and appealed for united allegiance to our flag. Dr. Silber, of New Orleans, followed with an address on the patriotism and loyalty of the Jewish people of America. He spoke of the Jewish love for America and of what the Jew owes to her. In his conclusion he said: "Although this hall is open to soldiers and civilians alike, it is closed to anyone who would not sacrifice all in the defense of the nation".

The 151st Regimental Band played a number of patriotic airs and was the guest of the assembly. Rev. George D. Booth, secretary of the religious work of the Army Y. M. C. A., offered the invocation. Among the other speakers were Mr. S. London, director of the headquarters, and Mr. Herman Katz, executive secretary.

The Jewish Community Hall for Soldiers' Welfare of Hattiesburg has become the most popular place for our boys in that thriving town. For the first ten days of this month we had an attendance of 413. Seventy-five men slept in the hall. Weekly features for the soldiers are now being planned. Seven men were visited at camp hospitals.

Camp Beauregard, Alexandria, La.

The formal opening of the Alexandria Branch of the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League took place at Alexandria Sunday, Oct. 14. It was a gala day in the city. A large assemblage of both the Jewish and non-Jewish population was present. Mr. William Peterson, president of the Alexandria branch of the league, presided, and among the speakers were Mayor Whittington, Jr., of Alexandria; Mr. Abe Freyer, of Shreveport; Ralph J. Schwarz, president of District 7, New Orleans, and Mr. Sam C. Blumenthal, in charge of the headquarters. It was one of the most important Jewish functions that has ever taken place at Alexandria and marks a milestone in the development of Jewish activities in Alexandria.

Mr. William Peterson, chairman, called the meeting to order, telling those who were present that the headquarters were open for the benefit and pleasure of the soldiers of Jewish faith, although all of the soldiers are welcome. Rabbi Jacob Aronson delivered the invocation, and then the president called upon Mayor Whittington. Mr. Whittington was followed by Brother Abe Freyer, of Shreveport, to whom a large amount of credit to the success of the organization of the Alexandria branch is due. He spoke of the aims and ideals of the B'nai B'rith and of our duty to our soldiers and sailors. Mr. Blmenthal, local director of the soldier work, then delivered an address on the aims and purposes of the headquarters and on the plan of the work that is to be done. The last speaker was President Ralph J. Schwarz, who spoke eloquently of the Order of B'nai B'rith and of its organization and achievements, and complimented the local members upon the establishment of local clubrooms.

After the addresses were concluded a reception was held and refreshments were served. In the evening a dinner was given at Hotel Bentley by the chairmen of the different committees of the Alexandria branch in honor of Brothers Schwarz, Freyer and Blumenthal. Mr. Blumenthal and his local committee are to put into effect a program of entertainments, smokers and amusements. Lectures are to be inaugurated so that every class of the Jewish men may be reached by the headquarters activities.

Camp Bowie, Ft. Worth, Texas.

The Hebrew Institute of Ft. Worth, one of the finest communal buildings in the country, has been turned over to the local branch of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League for the use of the soldiers. The local committee is headed by Rabbi Charles Blumenthal of the Congregation Ahavath Sholom, and Mr. Sol Wolfson is our worker there. The local committee has been extremely active and we cite a few excerpts from the reports of our worker there: "On Saturday, Nov. 8, the regular weekly dance of the Jewish Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League will be given at the Hebrew Institute. The Girls' Assembly Club will serve refreshments". These notices have been sent to the soldiers as well as to the townspeople: "The general public is cordially invited to a musical and literary program at the Hebrew Institute on Sunday, Nov. 4, at 8 p.m., given by the Jewish Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League. The speakers of the evening are Rabbi Blumenthal, Lieut. D. E. Kahn, Private Mark H. Webb and O. B. Greening, representing the Fosdick Commission. A number of musical numbers will be rendered". Here is a notice worth reading, sent out also by our workers here: "To the parents of the Jewish soldiers at Camp Bowie: If you wish any information about your boy in the camp, please write to us and we will gladly serve you in any capacity requested. If you come to visit your son or brother at Camp Bowie, call at the Hebrew Institute, 819 Taylor Street, and we will provide room for you at Jewish homes at a nominal rate, escort you to the camp and locate the person desired. As a stranger it will save you a great deal of inconvenience. We are glad to be at your service without any cost to you".

Besides this, our worker finds time to visit the sick men at the camp, meet strangers at the depot and in one case found for a wandering mother a son who had run away from home more than a year ago and who enlisted in a Texas company. His name was on the register of the Ft. Worth headquarters and our worker found no trouble in locating him.

The director of the Ft. Worth headquarters reports that there is an attendance of from 75 to 100 men at each of the two weekly affairs given for them.

Camp Grant, Rockford, Ill.

The Managing Board procured the services of Mr. Aaron Horvitz, of Pittsburgh, a Harvard graduate and formerly a practicing attorney of Pittsburgh, as director of the Rockford Branch of the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League. Mr. Horvitz has already demonstrated his interest and ability in social work to a large number of people.

The headquarters in Rockford are located in Rockford Hall, the finest and most spacious hall in the city. It is fitted up with pool tables, writing desks and chairs, and other furniture that is not surpassed by many clubs. Just now a great dedication is being planned by the local committee. Speakers are being selected. Nov. 25 is the date set. It is hoped to run a special train from Chicago for the Managing Board, parents and friends of the men in uniform and interested workers.

A number of Chicago organizations are planning affairs for the men at Camp Grant. Among these are the Young People's Jewish Congress Society of Chicago, the Sinai Players and the Northwest Fellowship Club. The I. O. B. B. lodges of Chicago are taking a great interest in this cantonment and delegates are being appointed to attend the dedication.

Officers of the Rockford Branch of the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League are: A. E. Schulein, president; Ira Goldman, vice-president; D. Pizer, treasurer; Aaron Horvitz, secretary. The following committees were also named: Executive Committee—A. S. Scheline, chairman; Charles Shanhouse, E. Oppenheim, Geo. Rubin, J. H. Krause, Mrs. Krojanker and Mrs. D. Pizer, ex-officio. Hospitality Committee—R. Pinko, chairman. Emergency Relief Committee—S. Goldman and Sig Mayer.

INSTRUCTIONS TO WORKERS.

1. It has been found a good plan to select camp representatives to represent the local director in each company or regiment. If you have not done this yet consider the advisability of doing this. This company or regimental representative can help you by distributing notices that you may send out, giving the names of the new Jewish additions to the company or regiment, and help to keep you informed of the general conditions of the boys.

2. Send to this office a list of the Jewish papers which you think the boys in your particular camp will read and the street number of your headquarters.

3. Arrange to meet the Jewish officers of your camp at least once a month and get their ideas and consult with them.

4. Visit the sick soldiers as often as possible and put yourself in communication with their families or guardians.

5. Put yourself at the service of the visiting friends and relatives of the soldiers. Keep at your office a list of the reputable hotels and boarding houses.

6. Spare no pains in letting soldiers know what and where our headquarters is and where you can be found.

7. Arrange, wherever possible, in connection with the local rabbis and religious organizations. Thanksgiving and Chanukah entertainments.

8. Always use as much soldier talent as you can in your entertainments and amusements.

9. Use placards generously in your headquarters and in your camp. Advertise your activities both in camp papers and in dailies, unless the cost is prohibitive. Placards like these in the headquarters will accomplish a great deal of good:

> Have You Written Home Today?
> Do You Sing or Play?
> Give your name to local director.
> Remember we are at your service. It is our desire and pleasure to be of any assistance. The I. O. B. B. lodges are at your service. Do you wish them to help you? If you have any suggestions to offer, leave them in this box.

You should have a box conveniently located, with a slit in the top for those who might wish to make suggestions and who are backward about giving their names. Get a few placards printed, showing when and where local rabbis may be found and when the services are held.

10. Have a mail box handy and have a supply of stamps on hand.

JEWISH OFFICERS IN RUSSIAN ARMY.

Two hundred Jewish students of the Peterhof Military College have been appointed officers in the Army. At the Moscow Alexeyeff Military College seventy Jews received the rank of officer.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

B'nai B'rith of Chicago

Ramah Lodge.

An unusually well attended meeting of,
e lodge was held at the Covenant Club all on Wednesday, Oct. 10, 1917. Spe-al feature of the meeting was lecture ccompanied by stereopticon views, delived by Hon. Charles S. Wharton, exember of Congress on "The City of 'ashington". The lecture proved most teresting and educational and at its onclusion a rising vote of thanks was ndered the speaker.

The lodge resolved to arrange a spe-al campaign for members and a comittee with Bro. O. G. Finkelstein, as airman was appointed to take charge this work. As a preliminary to the mpaign a large number of petitions r membership were presented at the eeting. It was decided that ten teams onsisting of ten members each, in arge of a captain, be organized and at a short effective campaign be conicted for two weeks in the hope that minimum of 500 new applications be cured. These teams decided to meet ily exchange information and data, id hold a general meeting once a week present the applications secured. At e time of writing this article more an 340 applications have been secured less than ten days of the campaign.
here is no doubt but that the full quota ill be realized.

At the meeting of the lodge a number standing committees were appointed.
ommittees on social and intellectual lvancement announced a program of ents to be arranged during the present ason, including B'nai B'rith Day Celeation, under the special auspices of the dge, in the last week in December, at hich time a class initiation the results the Propaganda campaign, will be the ecial feature.

Oriental-Hillel Lodge.

At the meeting of Oriental-Hillel iew of Camp Grant". Both talks were an instructive nature and were enthu-astically received by the members.

The lodge resolved to issue an appeal its members for voluntary contribuons to aid in its philanthropic and charitable activities. It was further resolved that if found necessary that a special assessment of $1 be levied upon such members of the lodge as have not voluntarily contributed to the philanthropic fund.

David Fish Lodge.

David Fish Lodge, No. 130, held several special meetings during the month of October as a result of an agitation to effect a consolidation with another lodge of the Order in the city. At the last meeting of the lodge held on Oct. 22, 1917, the question of consolidation being put to a final vote was almost unanimously defeated and a number of committees were appointed for the special purpose of finding ways and means to increase the revenues of the lodge and also to instill a more wholesome B'nai B'rith spirit among its members. David Fish Lodge contemplates embarking upon a short membership campaign in the near future.

Central B'nai B'rith Council.

The monthly meeting of the Central B'nai B'rith Council of Chicago representing the local lodges was held on Oct. 31, 1917, at the Covenant Club Hall. The attendance was unusually large and the subject matters brought up for action were of much interest and importance. Reports of various standing committees, social service, Anti-Defamation League, entertainment and Intellectual Advancement were presented, discussed and acted upon. The question of taking active interest in Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare Work was discussed with the result that the Social Service Committee of the Council was requested to devote as much of its activities in that direction as possible.

Covenant Club.

"A Beefsteak Supper and Stag" was given by the Covenant Club of Chicago on Thursday evening, Nov. 1, 1917, at the Covenant Club. Nearly 300 members were seated at the tables and a bountiful repast was served. During the dinner a number of professional entertainers carried out a varied and interesting program, consisting of recitation, dancing, singing and magic. At the close of the dinner the hall was cleared for athletic exhibitions of wrestling bouts and other numbers. The remainder of the evening was spent in amusements in the club rooms. All present were much pleased with the program as arranged and the affair cannot but prove beneficial to the Club.

Lincoln Lodge.

A well attended meeting of Lincoln
odge took place on Thursday evening,
ct. 4, at the Hotel Walton. There was esent at that meeting, Dr. Rosenthal, Lancaster, Past Grand President of istrict No. 3, who delivered a patriotic incoln Lodge to do their share in help-g the government in the present world ar.

The president gave a resume of his sit to Fort Hancock, after which the embers present pledged themselves to l in the campaign of the Order to ise money for the purchase of books r the soldiers now encamped. A large mmittee, which had been previously pointed by the president for that purse, reported that they were already orking on the proposition, and with ospects of great success.

The president appointed a committee arrange the details for the banquet of ncoln Lodge to be held in November, chairman being Mr. Harry M. Miller.

, Ala., appointed a committee with
o. Ferdinand Frank as chairman, to nds among its members and assist the unty and Zone committees in promotthe sale of bonds in every way pos-

le. The lodge resolved to invest all its funds in the hands of the treasury Liberty Bonds.

ESCHOL LODGE, DAYTON, OHIO.

In addition to the propaganda looking to securing a large class of representative candidates for initiation, Eschol Lodge No. 55, of Dayton, O., is doing excellent work for the soldiers. President Joseph Schwarz has appointed a number of committees, among them one on Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare Work which has been very busy among the large number of boys in training at the Wilbur Wright Aviation Field near Fairfield, O., and the additional large number of Dayton boys at Chillicothe. At an open meeting on Sep. 23 the Jewish soldiers were guests of the Lodge and listened with great interest to an address by Rabbi David Lefkowitz on "Why I am a Ben B'rith". On account of the added burden of the Welfare Committee the Lodge is urging a full attendance of members at each meeting.

B'NAI B'RITH OF PORTLAND.

Theodore Herzl Lodge No. 314 held its regular meeting on Tuesday evening, Oct. 23, 1917, at the B'nai B'rith building. Report of the Campaign Committee showed seventy applications for membership were secured up to that time. The committee is hopeful that at least one hundred applications for membership will be secured for the class initiation. After the meeting was closed, a dance was enjoyed in conjunction with the Ladies' Auxiliary of Oregon.

Oregon Auxiliary No. 2, Daughters of the Covenant, gave a successful card party on Tuesday afternoon, Oct. 16, 1917, for the benefit of Jewish soldiers in the cantonment at American Lake. Prizes were donated by various members and the affair was participated in by nearly all Jewish organizations in the city.

B'NAI B'RITH OF CLEVELAND.

The members of Cleveland Lodge No. 16, of Cleveland, Ohio, while waiting for Hon. Abram I. Elkus, Ambassador to Turkey, to arrive to address them at a public meeting, subscribed over $100,000 to the second Liberty Loan.

At the meeting of the Speakers' Club held Sunday, Oct. 14, it was decided that this season's activities should be in the nature of class work, the object being the study of the art of oratory and the great American orations. The lodge has signified its intention of engaging an experienced instructor for this purpose.

The first dance of the season by Cleveland Lodge No. 16 took place on Sunday, Oct. 28, 1917. The affair proved a decided success. An attempt is being made to institute a civic forum, the object of which is to discuss city government and it is intended to issue invitations to experts in the various phases to address the members. The first meeting took place on Oct. 31 and addresses were made by Mr. I. Freiberger of the Cleveland Trust Company, Mr. Paul Feiss and Mr. Emil Joseph. Mr. Freiberger spoke on finance, Mr. Joseph in regard to the lgal end and Mr. Feiss on efficiency.

Mr. Chas. Otis, president of the Chamber of Commerce, under the auspices of the Intellectual Advancement Committeee of Cleveland Lodge, addressed the B'nai B'rith Forum on "Cleveland—the City of Great Opportunities".

About 2,000 members and their friends attended "Mysterious Night," an entertainment given on Sunday, Oct. 14, 1917. The large crowd that gathered because of the name or any other cause were not disappointed. Much credit should be given to Mr. Oscar Friedman and his committee which arranged the entertainment, the first of the season, and which affair far outshined anything the B'nai B'rith has previously produced.

The first meeting of the Modern Drama Study Class was held on Oct. 10, 1917. Plans for an interesting study of the drama, beginning with Barrie, were made. A combination of the art and needlework class was effected, so that all the members may benefit by both classes.

A fancy dress dancing party was given by Cleveland Lodge on Sunday evening, Oct. 28, 1917.

Park plan dancing in the ball room and a smoker for the men in the meeting room were features of the election night entertainment given by Cleveland Lodge on Tuesday evening, Nov. 6, 1917. A special wire was secured to furnish those present the election returns as rapidly as received. A special midnight entertainment was arranged after the results of the election were announced.

On Sunday, Oct. 28, 1917, a most enjoyable evening was spent by a group of young women from the college for women and men from Odelbert and the Western Reserve Law School, who were the guests of Cleveland Lodge. Added zest was given by the presence of Sidney Kusworm of Dayton, second vice-president of the District Grand Lodge, who, entering into the spirit of the affair, led the games.

Thursday, Nov. 8, 1917, was the beginning of the new dancing class for young people.

In view of the great interest in athletics, Cleveland Lodge has decided to bring a basket-ball program into actual existence. The use of the gymnasium at Cedar and 76th Streets has been secured. A coach will direct the players and teams will subsequently enter for city tournaments.

HOME FOR THE AGED AT YONKERS.

Bro. Henry Meyers of Washington Lodge No. 19, of New York, the chairman of the entertainment committee of the board of governors of the Home for the Aged at Yonkers, has arranged a very interesting program for Thanksgiving Day to be held at the Home for the benefit of the members. Bro. Myron Sulzberger, president of the Home, will deliver the Thanksviging adrdess. Rev. S. Schlager, cantor of Temple Emanuel of New York, will have charge of the music. Brother Meyers will on this occasion present an American flag to the Home in behalf of a few well-wishers of the Home.

HOPE LODGE OF STOCKTON, CAL., ARRANGES LOVE FEAST IN HONOR OF SOLDIERS.

Hope Lodge, No. 126, of Stockton, Cal., gave a banquet on the evening of Sept. 12 in Red Men's Hall in honor of six of its members who have joined the United States forces.

It was one of the most whole-souled, patriotic and inspiring sessions ever held by a Stockton fraternal organization. Six members of the Order have either donned the khaki in defense of the flag within the last few weeks or are now awaiting the call to the colors. They are:

Dr. William Friedberger, lieutenant in the United States Medical Corps, now at Fort Mason.

Dr. Nathan Sinai, lieutenant in the United States Army, now awaiting orders to report. He will be attached to the veterinary department of the Army.

Ben Sinai of the United States Medical Corps, now stationed at the Presidio in San Francisco.

Jack Ganelis.
M. Shupert.
George Kline.

Nate Cohn, president of Hope Lodge, presided at the session, which opened with a prayer and an address by Rabbi Horowitz. In his address Rabbi Horowitz called attention to the fact that the Jew had always been found aligned on the side of liberty, peace and justice since the early ages. He rejoiced that members of Hope Lodge were now going out to fight for all that the Jew holds dear.

Then all present joined in the singing of "America."

During a recess the prettily decorated and heavily laden tables were arranged. The decorations were all patriotic in nature and in keeping with the spirit of the evening. The favors and the napkins were adorned with American flags. Tiny silk flags were stuck in the buns placed at each plate, and the cakes also were similarly decorated.

Rabbi Emanuel J. Jack, the new pastor of Temple Israel, delivered an intensely interesting address tracing the career of the Jew from the birth of the American nation, showing that he had always rendered unto the nation that which was its due, and he had always been found loyal.

Attorney Emil Gumpert gave a short address to the boys who are going to war. Harold Hirsch in a well worded address made a presentation to each of the Hope Lodge members answering the call. Each of the six was presented with a silk flag, an engraved membership card entitling him to admission to B'nai B'rith lodges wherever he may go, and a soldier's pocket mirror and passport bag. Hope Lodge will keep its soldier members in good standing during the period of their enlistment.

Dr. Nathan Sinai replied to the several addresses on behalf of the six young men who are going to war. He said that many had expressed sympathy for them. Sympathy, he said, should go to those who must remain at home, to the relatives of those who go. The soldier en route to France, he declared, would be constantly moving in new scenes. His mind would be fully occupied. He would be encountering broadening experiences. The worrying, he asserted, would be done by those who remain at home. He looked forward to service with cheerful anticipation.

During the evening through the kindness of the management of the Hippodrome Theatre, the lodge members were delightfully entertained. Miss Hayward's violin beauties, five in number, played a number of splendid selections, rendering "Star Spangled Banner" at the close, while all arose and sang the anthem. Mr. Vine, eccentric comedian, produced ripples of laughter, while Herman Rosenthal of San Francisco sang and gave impersonations.

Rabbi Jack brought the meeting to a close with an appropriate prayer.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

CINCINNATI LODGE, CINCINNATI, OHIO.

Attention of Cincinnati Lodge, No. 4, B'nai B'rith, was centered at its first fall initiatory exercises Monday night, Nov. 12, on the need of Jewish soldiers for distinctive Jewish social service and spiritual work.

Following a luncheon in the new $30,000 annex to the Rockdale Avenue Temple, addresses on what is needed for Jewish young men at Camp Sherman, Ohio, the Ohio cantonment, were made by Rabbis Louis Grossman, of the Plum Street Temple, and Jacob W. Kaplan, of the Reading Road Temple, and Mr. H. J. Rosenbaum, Jewish Social Service Director for Jewish soldiers at Camp Sherman. The necessity of having a building separate for the use of the Jewish soldiers as the Knights of Columbus are erecting for men of their faith was shown. There should be, it was urged, a building where services could be held. Praise was given the efforts of the Y. M. C. A. to show no discrimination, but it was pointed out that its work must be supplemented by distinctively Jewish activities.

Following the talks, Harry J. Levi, a district officer of the B'nai B'rith, took the floor and asked that the members voice some expression of their opinion. Oscar Berman lead off with a subscription of $100 and in four minutes more than $2,000 was raised. It was a rare sight, seeing the whole hall full of eager "bidders".

At the lodge meeting, a large class was initiated under the direction of President Joseph H. Levi. Rabbi Grossmann spoke on "Education Among Jews". He urged the need of greater emphasis being placed on the education of children in things Jewish. He said the sabbath school should be a more vital force.

Members of Cincinnati Lodge are greatly pleased by the change in the curriculum of English in the high schools so that "The Merchant of Venice" is omitted.

ACTIVITIES AT B'NAI B'RITH HEADQUARTERS, NEW YORK.

The B'nai B'rith headquarters were a busy hive last year. The lodges generally had interesting meetings and were well attended, thanks to the efforts of the enthusiasts, however few, who are the life and inspiration of the lodges. Some of these enthusiastic and worthy brothers will be greatly missed in the lodge rooms this year. They are in the service of the United States Government, some serving in the army and some in the navy, and some in other branches of the Government. In serving the flag they are carrying out a fundamental B'nai B'rith principal, patriotism.

We hope that some of our brothers who might have been more active in the work of the Order than they have been, will come forward to take the places of those good brothers and continue the activities in which they were so much interested. The B'nai B'rith work must go on. The greatest honor we could pay to our patriotic absent brothers, when let us hope they will return to us in good health and in good spirits, is to show them that their patriotism and their B'nai B'rith spirit generally have inspired those they left behind to emulate the good example which they set up by their zeal and earnestness in the lodge room, where the best of Jewish manhood is and should be brought out for the good of our Order and our country.

ACTIVITIES OF OMAHA LODGE, OMAHA, NEB.

Official Visit to Lincoln, Neb.

On Sunday, Sept. 30, 1917, President Bro. Harry H. Lapidus and Past Presidents, Bros. C. H. Elgutter, Jacob Simon, Jacob Slosburg, Jr., Sam J. Leon, Henry Monsky, Sam Dansky, A. Monheit and Arthur Rosenblum, of the lodge made a trip to Lincoln, Neb., for the purpose of opening a campaign in behalf of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League of the I. O. B. B.

A meeting was held on the afternoon of that date, which was largely attended. The meeting was an enthusiastic one and rousing speeches were made.

The sum of $250 was raised at this meeting and a Finance Committee was appointed by the Lincoln Lodge to solicit funds for the Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League.

Patriotic Meeting by Omaha Lodge.

On Thursday evening, Oct. 11, Omaha Lodge, No. 354, held a Patriotic Meeting, which brought credit and a great deal of pride to the lodge. The meeting was attended by more than six hundred people, which was a remarkable turnout, even though the weather was unfavorable. It was the prevailing opinion that this was the best Patriotic Rally ever held in Omaha under the auspices of a Jewish organization.

Class Initiation.

On Sunday afternoon, Oct. 14, Omaha Lodge, No. 354, held a special meeting for the purpose of initiating a large class, as members of the lodge. The meeting was well attended and the degree team outshone itself in the splendid and inspiring manner in which the work was done. Men who have heard the ritual a number of times at initiations were never inspired as they were at this time. The lodge feels proud that it can boast of an initiation team which is a credit, not only to the lodge, but second to none in the District.

Omaha Lodge is making a mark for itself along all lines of B'nai B'rith activities.

Under the auspices of the Social Service Committee of Omaha Lodge, No. 354, of Omaha, Neb., cards known as "Loyal American Child's Pledge" were distributed to 30,000 school children attending the grade schools in Omaha. The Social Service Committee deserves much credit in fostering this movement and the teachers and principals of the various schools were glad to distribute these cards. We publish herewith the card as it appears:

Loyal American Child's Pledge.

I will avoid all waste—to this I truly swear;
I will be careful of my clothes and everything I wear;
No foolish pennies will I spend, but save that I may give
To those less fortunate than I, who find it hard to live;
And what I take upon my plate, I'll eat up every bit,
Nor make complaint, because I'm not fond of it;
And dishes new I'll eat, as far as I am able;
But one thing I will never be—that's finicky at table.
This pledge I take, because I am
A soldier true of Uncle Sam.

B'NAI B'RITH ACTIVITIES IN BEHALF OF RED CROSS.

At the suggestion of Bro. Myron Sulzberger, president of the Board of Governors of "Our Home" at Yonkers, the Ladies' Auxiliary of the Home have been doing some very fine work for the Red Cross all through the summer months. These good women met regularly in the hottest days all through the summer and worked from morning till evening sewing garments for the soldier boys. Bro. Herman Asher, chairman of the Building Committee, placed the reception rooms of the Headquarters at the disposal of those worthy women in the interest of this worthy cause.

If any of the mothers, sisters, daughters or wives of our brothers feel that they can spare a morning or an afternoon on Wednesdays let them call at the B'nai B'rith Headquarters and they will find plenty to do. There is much to be done and we cannot do enough for our Government.

SAN FRANCISCO YOUTHS' AUXILIARY.

By Paul A. Braun.

The Leo N. Levi Youths' Auxiliary of San Francisco deeply regrets the loss of their honored commissioner, Dr. Richard M. Cerf, who has answered the call of his country.

Just after the declaration of war, Dr. Cerf enlisted in the Reserve Corps and was soon promoted to the rank of lieutenant. He received the call from Washington and directly departed for Camp Linde Viste, where he is now stationed.

A joint meeting of the two auxiliaries was held, in which Prof. S. E. Welfield was introduced as acting commissioner in Dr. Cerf's absence. He opened the meeting with a short talk for the boys, entitled "The American Boy's Part in This War". He told how the American boy will play a big part in saving the food for the soldiers and thus helping America win this war.

Prof. Welfield also promised a series of lectures on hygiene and announced that the first will take place soon.

The Library Committee reported that the new circulating library will be in full operation by the end of the month, and that all members will be able to take out books.

Upon recommendation of one of the members the following resolution was read and approved:

Whereas, our President proclaimed a state of war against Germany on April 2, 1917, and

Whereas, it has been made to appear in connection with said proclamation of war that Germany has ruthlessly attacked and destroyed American lives and property in violation of humane practices and international law, and has also wantonly failed to recognize the principles of justice and humanity, and

Whereas, it has been made clearly evident that the democracy of America is threatened, and the lives of American people and property endangered by a reckless and cruel foe, and

Whereas, the exigent situation has commanded the call to arms of America's manhood, and

Whereas, in response to such exigent situation Dr. Richard M. Cerf, former commissioner of our Leo N. Levi Youths' Auxiliary, I. O. B. B. did patriotically and of his own volition, enlist his service to his country's cause.

Now, therefore, be it resolved that the said Dr. Richard M. Cerf be highly commended for this act, and that he be designated as "Honorary Chairman" of the said Leo N. Levi Youths' Auxiliary, I. O. B. B., by the members' unanimous vote sitting in regular session.

And it is further resolved that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to said Dr. Richard M. Cerf at the cantonment where he is now situated.

(Signed) PROF. S. E. WELFIELD,
Acting Commissioner.

In honor of the visit of Bro. D. N. Mossessohn of the District Grand Lodge to San Francisco, a luncheon will be tendered by the B'nai B'rith of the city on Wednesday noon, Nov. 21, at the Palace Hotel.

The Committee of Fifty, representing the San Francisco lodges, recently entertained the inmates of the Old People's Home, which entertainment is an annual event. Members generously volunteered automobiles so that all of the inmates could be afforded a pleasure ride through the city. They were driven through the interesting spots of the city and enjoyed themselves immensely.

sorts of caricatures, just for the sake of becoming ridiculous. This is plain nonsense. Frederick was a protectionist, and, therefore, believed in the manufacture of luxuries at home. Not finding anyone who would take the risk of establishing a china factory, he started such a business on his own account. The original product probably was not very good, and in addition goods of this kind require a certain reputation. So the king expected to engage the commercial ability of the Jews to assist him in finding a market for the goods of his establishment abroad. This law was abolished in 1787. Frederick the Great had died in 1786, and the leaders of the Jewish community, feeling that now the time had come to act, approached the new king, Frederick William II, with the request to improve their condition. The king recognized the justice of their demand in principle, but Prussia, as a bureaucratic country, moved slowly. A commission was appointed in 1787. It presented reports and sent out circulars, demanded opinions, reported on the opinions, so that in 1792, the king indignantly demanded action. In the same year, however, war broke out and the action was postponed and although the king ordered that the preparation for such legislation be continued to be acted upon when peace should have been established, he died in 1797 without seeing any definite result. The abrogation of the compulsion to buy the royal china, and of the "Leibzoll," where it still existed, were the only tangible results of the reform movement.

Meantime the literary propaganda for the improvement of the Jewish condition helped in preparing the way. One of the most noteworthy works of this kind was a book, written by Christian Wilhelm Dohm, a royal official in the war department, who upon the request, and with the assistance of Mendelssohn, wrote a book, entitled "The Civic Improvement of the Jews", which was published in 1781. We may briefly sum up the arguments of Dohm by stating that complaints against the Jews, as far as they are just, are the result of the restrictions imposed upon them. He advises to give them the right to engage in all honest occupations instead of compelling them to live by petty trading and money-lending, and there will be no Jewish question at all. Dohm's book was the result of a movement which agitated the Jews of Alsace. This German province, containing by far the majority of all Jews, living under French jurisdiction, was overpopulated with Jews, who in addition were restricted to villages and some small towns. Their occupation, therefore, was mostly that of peddlers, horse and cattle dealers, living in straightened circumstances, and at the same time being compelled to eke out an existence by forcing their goods on the peasants, demanding a high rate of interest on their loans, and so becoming in many instances really obnoxious. There were among them exceptionally some prominent merchants who clearly saw the source of the trouble. The most prominent Alsatian Jew at that time was Herz Medelsheim (1726-1794), a contractor for the army, who was the first Jew to be admitted to Strasburg after the expulsion which took place in the fourteenth century. Herz adopted the French name of Cerfberr, but in signing letters, even those addressed to the highest officials of the state, he puts the Hebrew name in the flourishes under his signature. His business books were kept in Yiddish, and they are now quite a curiosity, as is the place where they were preserved, the archives of the Prince of Monaco. To the efforts of Cerfberr, the agitation of public opinion in France on the Jewish question was mainly due. The academy of Metz offered a prize for the solution of the problem, how the Jews could be made happier, and at the same time more useful citizens. Three essays were awarded the prize, the first written by the Catholic priest Gregoire, afterwards bishop, and a prominent politician in the revolutionary period; the second by Thierry, a lawyer of Nancy, and a third by Zalkind Hourwitz, a native of Kowno, who having come to Metz as Bahur at the Yeshibah of Rabbi Aryeh Loeb, who was also a native of Lithuania, drifted into Paris, where he made a living by tutoring. The most remarkable of these three essays is the one by the Catholic priest. Father Gregoire's advice can be summed up in the words: "Treat the Jews better, and they will be better citizens". His philosophy is the inverse presentation of Karl Emil Franzos' famous epigram: "Every country has the Jews which it deserves". Gregoire's book was published in 1788. A year afterwards the states-general was called to Paris, Gregoire was a member of this assembly, and soon had an opportunity to act on behalf of the Jews in the same sense in which he had written for them.

Thus the epoch-making event, inaugurating a new period of Jewish history, revolutionized all existing conditions and accepted ideas. It was only natural that even on the Jewish side the importance was not fully appreciated. The Jews lacked political training. They had been used from time immemorial to believe in their isolation as a divine destiny and all they wished was the protection of their lives and their property, and some improvement in these laws that restricted them in their chance of making an honest livelihood. In their spiritual life most of them wished to be left severely alone. The best illustration of this sentiment comes from a Hasidic legend. Loeb Sarah's (1730-1790), one of the most popular Hasidic rabbis and a disciple of the famous Baer the Maggid, is said to have transported himself miraculously eve Friday to Vienna, where he slapped th face of Emperor Joseph II, pinched ar cuffed him until the poor man yelled wi pain and asked for assistance, which n body could render him, because Loe had made himself invisible. Finally th emperor made a pilgrimage to Jaltushk in Podolia, where the Wunderrabi r sided, and begged him to rather kill hi than to subject him to such pain. Loe however, made himself again invisibl and so the emperor returned to Vienn but not without depositing a charm the threshhold of Loeb's hovel, and both died in the same year, 1790, th rabbi as the victim of witchcraft, and th emperor of the rabbi's curse.

THIRTY-TWO RABBIS ARE CHAPLAINS IN FRENCH ARMY.

Rabbi A. Blum received the followin letter from his friend and colleague Rabbi Albert Levy, Grand Rabbi of th Central Consistory of France, in repl to a request made before the Jewis holidays, that he should notify all th Rabbis of the cities where the America soldiers are stationed, to invite the Jewish men to celebrate New Year and th Day of Atonement with their coreligionists.

ITALIAN GOVERNMENT TAKES ZIONIST INITIATIVE.

New York, Oct. 15.—The Italian Government is taking the initiative in the councils of the Allies to secure Palestine for the Jewish people, and the move it has already made in that direction have vastly strengthened the hands of the United States, England, France and Russia, which are known to favor the project of establishing a Jewish State in the Holy Land.

The Executive Committee of the Italian Jewish Communities has sent this information to the Provisional Zionist Committee, quoting a recent interview, granted by Signor Boselli, the Italian Minister for Foreign Affairs, to Nahum Sokolow, the head of the International Zionist Political Committee, at which several members of the committee were present.

Signor Boselli received Mr. Sokolow with unusual courtesy and displayed unusual familiarity and sympathy with the aspirations of the Jewish people as laid before him by the deputation. He expressed his confidence that the war would bring about full civic and religious liberty for the Jews in the lands where these rights have been denied them, and then added that the Italian Government would intervene directly in the matter of securing Palestine for the Jewish people, and that what it had already done had greatly strengthened the steps already taken in that direction by the Allies.

The Executive Committee of the Italian Jewish Communities is taking steps to convene a conference of Jewish organizations throughout the world to be held in Paris at the earliest possible moment, for the purpose of taking the practical steps that will be necessary to establish the Jewish State when the way for it has been cleared by the Allies. Jewish organizations in America will be invited to this conference.

Review of Late Events in Soldiers' Welfare Work by the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith

Much is being said about the work of ie American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welre League of the I. O. B. B. The test f this work is the way in which it has een accepted by the soldiers themlves and by their friends and relaves. From many of these letters have een received. We reprint extracts from few of them.

Mr. Sam Schwarz, of Hempstead, ex., writes:

"For your kindness extended to my randson you have my sincerest thanks".

Mrs. Gussie S. Galewsky writes to our epresentative at Camp Bowie, Fort Vorth, Tex.:

"What a world of comfort your few nes this morning brought to us. It is he first direct news that we have had rom our boy. It was with keen appreiation that I read the sincere sentinents you expressed. My 'mothereart' instinctively felt that if ever my oy needed befriending, I could call pon you".

Sergeant J. Herstein, of Camp Shelby, rites home in part as follows:

"The lodge has opened a hall for the oldier boys and they are doing wonerful work. During the holidays they eld services for the Jewish soldiers and fter services arranged that all the boys e cared for by the Jewish families for heir meals and sleeping quarters. They ave writing tables in the hall and all he writing necessities, such as paper nd envelopes, pens and ink and plenty f reading matter and even sleeping uarters for the boys who wish to stay n town over night. The camp is twelve niles out of town and often the boys niss the train, so that these headquarers are a great convenience for them".

Mr. E. L. Gaston, cashier of the Citiens' National Bank of Meridian, Miss., rites to our social worker at Hattiesurg:

"I wish to thank you sincerely for our letter of Nov. 2, giving informaon that was of considerable value and nportance to Private Harry Mabb, who at this time confined to Turner's Hosital. Due to your activities this young an has not only heard from some of is comrades at Camp Shelby, but has eceived from one of them the money hich was on his person at the time of is accident several weeks ago. He is ery grateful for what has been done r him and has asked that you be exnded his most sincere appreciation".

Sergeant Morris Roe of Company A, hree Hundred and Tenth Battalion, ignal Corps, U. S. A., Camp Custer, attle Creek, Mich., writes to his father:

"Father Dear: You can see by the bove heading I am answering your ost welcome letter from the B'nai rith Club rooms they have outfitted comfortably for the boys when they ome to Battle Creek. They certainly e treating the boys royally and exersing all their efforts to make it homeke. Every Wednesday, Saturday and unday afternoon and evening they rve good coffee with real cream and ce home-made cookies".

Mrs. Emily Weinberg, one of the unders of the Council of Jewish omen, writes:

"Your recreation rooms at Rockford ave already proved a boon for many the boys at Camp Grant, who now el that they have a place to go to when Rockford, and also have a place to ceive their mothers and sisters.

"It is my sincere hope that the good ork of the B'nai B'rith Welfare eague will grow larger and larger and am sure that every right-thinking Jew man and woman can but feel that it ds in keeping our boys in the right th."

Mr. Bernard Finkel, who is stationed Camp Custer, Mich., a member of enver Lodge, writes to the secretary Denver Lodge as follows:

"I attended a meeting of the B'nai rith Lodge in Kalamazoo. I want to take this opportunity of informing you that the Order is certainly doing great work among the Jewish boys at the camp, and that the local communities are co-operating with them to a degree that makes brotherly love not an empty phrase".

Private Jerome B. Schram, stationed at Camp Grant, writes:

"Yesterday was a big day. The B'nai B'rith gave an entertainment and dance and we had a wonderful time."

The following letter was written to Mr. Adolf Kraus by Mrs. Abram S. Farber, of Chicago:

"When I was asked to be chaperon, together with a number of other women, to a group of girls who were going to Rockford on Sunday, Dec. 9, to participate in an entertainment for our soldiers, the idea at first did not strike me favorably, and I deliberated many days before I decided to take the trip. I thought the wisest thing to do before I would offer any criticism, would be to see what work the B'nai B'rith was doing. I cannot find words in my vocabulary that would sufficiently praise this wonderful undertaking. We clamor for social centers and playgrounds in our schools to keep the young people off the streets, but are prone to criticize such an undertaking as yours and yet it is the most wonderful thing that could ever happen to a soldier boy, when he has a few hours away from camp, to be afforded clean amusement and a little rest after his tiresome duties of the day".

Lieut. Col. N. Lapowsky, of the 61st Depot Brigade, stationed at Fort Worth, Texas, in a letter to the Jewish Monitor of Fort Worth, Texas, among other things says: "Having been in the service for the last twenty-seven years, I know the life of the soldier thoroughly, especially that of the enlisted man away from home. . . . I, therefore, was delighted to receive an invitation to a social and dance given by the Jewish Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League at the Hebrew Institute at Fort Worth. I wish to state that never in my career have I witnessed such entertainment given for the benefit of the soldiers, and it is indeed commendable. . . . I shall say that it is just what the soldiers away from home need. They appreciate it very highly and patiently wait for the next Saturday to come so that they can attend the next one."

Every mail brings us similar letters.

The work of the B'nai B'rith is a work of love, prompted by patriotism, and is recognized as such by the War Department. In a letter addressed to Mr. Kraus, bearing date Nov. 27, 1917, Mr. Raymond B. Fosdick of the War Department Commission on Training Camp Activities, Washington, writes as follows:

"Your activity at Rockford, which has already been brought to our attention and which you mention in your letter, is a very creditable piece of work and we sincerely hope you will continue it and extend it".

Is it possible that in all the United States a man can be found who will charge that we undertook the welfare work in order to EXPLOIT THE SOLDIERS FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE ORDER? Yes, such a man has been found. He is a lawyer, a prominent member of a congregation, a member of the American Jewish Commitee, a member of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work, a gentleman whom we heretofore regarded highly. He is Mr. Fred M. Butzel, of Detroit. Under date of Nov. 14, 1917, Mr. Butzel writes to Col. Cutler as follows:

"I wish to say that we have tremendous respect for and confidence in Mr. Samuel Folz, of Kalamazoo". (Mr. Folz represents the B'nai B'rith welfare work in the State of Michigan.) " We, however, realize that he is a good lodge man and do not wish to have him acting under the direction and authority of the B'nai B'rith lodge for the purpose of exploiting the soldiers for the benefit of the Order. As an independent committeeman with proper associates under the general direction of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work he is undoubtedly the ablest man whom we could get".

We agree with Mr. Butzel that no better man can be secured to attend to the work of looking after the welfare work of soldiers in Michigan than Mr. Samuel Folz, of Kalamazoo, and for that reason he was selected to take charge of that work. We also, like Mr. Butzel, have a tremendous respect for and confidence in Mr. Folz. He fully understands that we have undertaken the soldiers' welfare work out of patriotic motives and not for the purpose of exploiting the soldiers. If our object was to exploit the soldiers, neither he nor any other good citizen would be a party to it.

Mr. Butzel's reference to "proper associates" is a direct insult to each and every member of the Order, including Colonel Cutler, who, as a member of the Order, has received the highest honors which his district could confer. We are not in possession .of Mr. Cutler's reply.

We would not notice such slurs from a man of no standing, but Mr. Butzel's attempt to tear down instead of helping to build up, cannot be permitted to go unnoticed. All of us have enough to contend with against enemies from without. We did not look for such an attack from such a source from within.

We now call attention to the following letter written on the official letterhead of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work:

"Nov. 27, 1917.

"Mr. Meyer B. Silberman, Des Moines, Iowa.

"Dear Sir: I am in receipt of your letter of Nov. 22, addressed to Mr. Harry Cutler, who asks me to reply to the same. We fully realize the position of your community, and it is not our desire to duplicate the work of what you are doing; but the desire of the Jews of the United States has been to coordinate the work and not have a duplication of the same through independent efforts.

"I am inclosing herewith the correspondence from the Secretary of War. After all his word is the final one as to the activities to be carried on in the camps. It would appear to us as vital that your community co-ordinate with us and that you form your local branch as part of our work. All the communities in the country are doing so, and as soon as we hear favorably from you we will be pleased to send you the exact lines of how the various communities are forming their local boards and working in co-operation with us.

"Yours very truly,
(Signed)
"HENRY J. BERNHEIMER,
"Chairman Propaganda Committee".

It is some satisfaction to have at last found a man who knows what the desire of the Jews of the United States is and who is in the position to inform us that all the communities in the country are co-ordinating and working with the Jewish Board for Welfare Work. If anyone except Mr. Bernheimer would have made those statements we would, without the slightest hesitation, have said that he is misinformed, but as Mr. Bernheimer says so there is nothing more to be said. By the way, who is Mr. Bernheimer?

We, however, fully agree with one of Mr. Bernheimer's statements, namely, that the word of the War Department is the final one. If Mr. Bernheimer and his associates who have flooded the country with copies of Mr. Fosdick's letters tending to show that the Jewish Board for Welfare Work will be the only Jewish agency to be recognized by the War Department for work within the camps, will pay the same respect to Mr. Fosdick's hope that we will continue and extend our work outside of camps, there will once more be peace and an unseemly strife will be ended.

Mr. Bernheimer also writes:

"It is not our desire to duplicate the work of what you are doing".

To that we answer, Amen!

We have noticed in a certain publication a criticism based on incorrect statements of fact as to reasons why the B'nai B'rith decided not to join forces with the Welfare Board. We have no intention to continue discussing the reasons why we work independently of the other organization, as it can serve no useful purpose, but may only tend to destroy friendships previously existing. Therefore, we will confine what we have to say on that subject to this publication. The present administration of the B'nai B'rith has adopted the policy to merge activities on important matters with other Jewish organizations, but not to merge the organization. This policy will be adhered to by the present administration. An agreement for co-operation in welfare work was reached between the Jewish Board for Welfare Work and the B'nai B'rith and would have been carried out had not at the last moment the Welfare Board insisted that all the work had to be done in the name of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work. In other words, demand was made that not only the activities but also the organizations should merge. Mr. Kraus, while in New York on Oct. 28, 1917, was told on good authority that Colonel Cutler on behalf of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work had declared that that decision was final and no concessions would be made. As that position was against the declared policy of the Administration of the Order, it could only be construed as an abrogation of the agreement previously entered into.

Our friends, the enemies, will no doubt say that such a policy is prompted by the desire to receive credit for work done. Were it so, it would be legitimate, but it is not so. We have learned from experience that we can obtain better service from our members if we do not merge our organization with other organizations, and in the work we are now engaged in we want the very best service—therefore, our policy.

On Nov. 29, the heads of fraternal organizations met the Secretary of War in Washington, at his invitation. The Secretary at that conference said that the most important work in order to maintain the efficiency and morale of the men, was not in the camps, but was outside of the camps. Mr. Kraus there stated that that was the very work which the Order was doing at Rockford and other places and would probably so confine its efforts.

The Advisory Committee of the Order met on Nov. 2, 1917, and decided to avoid as far as possible duplicating any work already started by the Jewish Board for Welfare Work and to do the work independently of any other organization. That decision was promptly made public. Yet Mr. Fosdick in his letter of Nov. 27, states:

"We understand that your fraternity made arrangements with that Board" (The Jewish Board for Welfare Work) "to work through its agency".

We cannot help but wonder who gave Mr. Fosdick the impression as late as Nov. 27, that we had made arrangements to work through the agency of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work.

Mr. Kraus was of the opinion that the ruling of the Department that work within the camps should be done through the agency of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work, applied only to such work as the building of shacks and places of meeting and entertainment for the soldiers within the camps, and as many of the Jewish men objected to having separate shacks built for them, and since the B'nai B'rith had no intention of doing

The work of the League has been growing in importance and usefulness. With each passing day the usefulness of the club headquarters has been more firmly demonstrated. Thousands of Jewish soldiers and many non-Jewish soldiers are taking advantage of the clubrooms and many favorable comments have been heard. Many letters bear testimony to the services that our workers are rendering, both to the men and their friends and relatives. In a letter to Mr. Adolf Kraus, the Hon. Raymond B. Fosdick, chairman of the Commission on Training Camp Activities, writes: "Your activity at Rockford, which has already been brought to our attention, is a very creditable piece of work, and we sincerely hope you will continue it and extend it". Our work outside of the camp has thus been both recognized and commended by the War Department.

The activities of the clubrooms have received the praise of both officers and men. At the dedication of our clubrooms for Camp Grant, at Rockford, Ill., Col. H. O. S. Hiestand represented Major General Barry, and told those present that a clubroom such as is there located was to be commended. Two officers who were present at an affair given in one of our headquarters, in lecturing on "Efficiency" to their respective companies, expressed the sentiment that if the soldiers would spend their time out of camp in places of this sort that such lectures would not be necessary.

At one of our headquarters the following incident took place. Three soldiers came into the rooms. One saw a pool table and remarked to our director that he would like to play pool. When invited to do so, he told our director that his friends did not play, and thereupon our director offered to play with him. At the end of the game, the soldier threw down what he thought would be the charge, and of course it was returned. He asked what sort of a place this was, and why playing was permitted without charging. He was told that the clubrooms were under the auspices of the B'nai B'rith, a Jewish Order, and that all of this was for the benefit of the men in uniform. He went back to speak to his friends, who were writing letters on our stationery, and after a whispered conversation, the three walked up to our director, thanked him for his courtesies, and commented most favorably upon the liberality of an organization that provided such fine quarters and even free amusements for men who were not even of the Jewish faith.

One evening our director at one of the headquarters received a message to meet an elderly lady who was coming to meet her soldier son. He went to meet the early morning train, and there found an old lady who could hardly make herself understood in English. She had decided suddenly to visit her boy, and though she could hardly speak English, she decided to come, knowing that the worker would render her every service that she needed. It is hardly necessary to say that little time was lost in locating the boy and bringing him to his mother.

At another camp a soldier met with an accident. The first thing that his folks knew about the mishap was the communication from our director that the boy was doing nicely. Our director was rendering a service which no money could pay for.

Our work has been especially effective in those cantonments where recently near-epidemics have been prevalent. Even where camps have been quarantined, the personal service has been in such demand that our men have been kept busy from morning until night.

New work has been undertaken since the last report. At Omaha, Neb. a sum has been set aside and the Y. M. H. A. rooms have been fitted up as the town headquarters and clubrooms for the large balloon station near that city. A strong branch of the League has been organized, and the men are taking every advantage of these new recreation quarters.

A number of the boys at the Rock Island arsenal have been reached through the B'nai B'rith representatives at Davenport, and besides stationery and supplies, sweaters, socks and other articles have been given those boys who needed them. Plans are now under way to equip a clubroom for the men from the arsenal at Davenport.

District No. 3 has decided to equip a town headquarters at Trenton, N. J. With this in view, a visit was made by the representatives of that district, and negotiations are now pending whereby that city will have clubroom quarters for the men of Camp Dix. District No. 2 has also decided to establish quarters at various camps in its territory, and a committee is now working out plans to this end. The work of the League is being extended, in response to demands from soldiers and civilians alike.

Camp Bowie, Ft. Worth, Texas.

The activities of the League among the soldiers in this camp and those of the surrounding aviation camps, have greatly increased, due to the fact that the men are becoming better acquainted with our headquarters. Here two affairs are given every week, a dance on Saturday night at which refreshments are served, and a social and musicale on Sunday night, followed by one hour's dancing. The largest affair this month was the General Hoffman evening, attended by more than 450 persons. On that night General Hoffman delivered an address in which he praised the work of the Jews, and that of the organization which sponsored our activity. The 61st Depot Brigade furnished the music. In connection with this affair we quote from a letter of Lieut. Col. Lapowski, to the Jewish Monitor, in which he says:

"Having been in the service for the last twenty-seven years, I know the life of the soldier thoroughly, especially that of the enlisted man, away from home, with hardly any entertainment, occupied all week by his schedule issued from the Division Headquarters, from 5:30 in the morning until 8:00 o'clock in the evening. I therefore was delighted to receive an invitation to a social and dance given by the Jewish Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League at the Hebrew Institute, extended to me by Rabbi Charles Blumenthal. I accepted it with pleasure, and I wish to state that never in my career have I witnessed such entertainment given for the benefit of the soldiers, and it is indeed commendable. In fact, after attending several of the affairs I was exceedingly surprised at the way everything was carried on, and I shall say that this is just what the soldiers away from home need. They appreciate it very highly, and they talk about it the balance of the week, and they patiently wait for the next Saturday to come, so that they can attend the next one. And, therefore, on behalf of the Jewish soldiers of Camp Bowie, I take the liberty of thanking Rabbi Blumenthal and his committee for their splendid efforts in our behalf".

The Ft. Worth headquarters were visited by more than 1,000 men during the month of November, besides a large number of friends and relatives from all parts of Texas and Oklahoma. The attendance here has been so large that the capacity of the reading and writing rooms had to be increased.

Frequent visits have been made by our workers to the base hospital on account of the large number of cases of illness. There are three aviation camps near Ft. Worth, besides Camp Bowie, and these, too, are now included in our activities there. It is an inspiring sight to meet men from the United States, Canada and England in our clubrooms, all fighting for a common purpose. The camps have been quarantined, but our workers there have planned to keep in touch with the boys by sending them packages of sweets, books and magazines.

Camp Logan, Houston, Texas.

The work in Houston has been increasing on account of the large number of men that are being sent there from the North, mainly from Camp Grant at Rockford. The local community is planning a number of activities under the direction of our worker, the most important of which is a dance to be given Dec. 16 for the benefit of the local branch of the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League.

During the month of November thirteen entertainments of a various character were given for the soldiers under the direction of our worker. These included dances, smokers and other gatherings. One hundred and seven personal interviews were held with soldiers regarding matters of personal interest to them. Thirty-three visits were made to the base hospital and one man was given civilian medical attention while on leave.

During the cold spell every sick soldier was presented with a sweater. Thirty-four acts of personal service were rendered to friends and relatives of the soldiers, and 1,284 men visited the clubrooms. This does not include the number of those who visited the entertainments. Three loans were made to soldiers aggregating the sum of $89.00, and more than 1,100 pieces of literature, including letters, notices and invitations, were distributed at the camp.

Maj. Gustavus M. Blech, formerly of Chicago, and assistant Division Surgeon of the 33rd Division, delivered an address at the affair for the soldiers given at the Jewish Literary Society on Nov. 27, in which he spoke of the work of the medical men and the Red Cross. In the course of his remarks he expressed his appreciation and that of the Jewish officers and men at Camp Logan for the efforts in their behalf.

Camp Shelby, Hattiesburg, Miss.

The work at Camp Shelby has increased and the soldiers have become more familiar with our clubrooms. A number of cots have been installed for the boys who remain over night, and these have proved very popular. There are now more than forty of these cots, and the local committee is contemplating the purchase of more. It was found necessary to enlarge these quarters and several hundred dollars have already been spent. While on week days the attendance is not taxed to the capacity of the Jewish Community Hall for Soldier Welfare, it has been found that men have been turned away on Saturday and Sunday, especially when it comes to the use of the over-night facilities.

A number of affairs have been given at Hattiesburg, and our director there has made a special effort to use soldier talent in all of the entertainments planned by him. On Nov. 14 a dance was given, and it was one of the best attended affairs of the season. These affairs have proven extremely popular and there were more than 125 men in attendance.

On account of the recent cold spell the activities have been lessened. Services have been arranged each Sunday morning for the men who are outside of the camp, and these are being conducted by Mr. Herman Katz. The Jewish community of Hattiesburg is exerting every effort to make the stay of the boys of that camp pleasant, and with our director of the Jewish Community Hall a great deal of service has been rendered, not only to the soldiers themselves, but to the many relatives and friends of the soldiers who come to see them.

Letters have been received, and one especially interesting from a non-Jew, in which he thanks our director for the services rendered to a friend of his who had met with an accident, and about whom nothing had been heard until our director had interested himself in the case. It is such work as this that is making the B'nai B'rith recreation quarters and their service workers indispensable institutions in the camps near which they are located.

Camp Beauregard, Alexandria, La.

There is little to report from this camp this month in view of the fact that the camp has been in quarantine. One large affair was given Nov. 7. Our worker is making every effort to keep in touch with the men who are sick, and with their relatives. It is a rather interesting fact to note that the percentage of illness among the Jewish boys is much less than that among others. It is hoped that the quarantine will be lifted very soon, when our recreation quarters will again become the popular meeting place that it has heretofore been.

Camp Dodge, Des Moines, Ia.

Our director at Camp Dodge reports that the new men who have been sent there are just beginning to acquaint themselves with our headquarters, and that the attendance daily has been running from 15 to 30. There are only 200 Jewish men at Camp Dodge at the present time, but a large number is expected in the course of time.

At a smoker some 90 men in uniform were present, and the soldiers furnished the entertainment. The ladies of Rabbi Cohen's congregation tendered a tea party and dance at which 40 men in uniform were present, and the ladies of Rabbi Mannheimer's Temple gave a series of dinners at which there were about 30 present. On Nov. 10 and Nov. 17 dances were arranged at the clubrooms and on Nov. 18 a whist party was given at which there was a large number of men present. The women of Rabbi Cohen's congregation arranged a big Chanukkah spread for the boys.

Our camp director has been somewhat busier than usual on account of some serious cases of illness at the base hospital. In one case one of the boys in uniform had to undergo an operation, and he asked that our director be with him in his hour of distress This service, of course, was gladly rendered. To the other boys our worker brough refreshments and books and rendere such personal service as the men wh are sick, and who have no friends an relatives nearby need. These are case which show how badly needed the services of our director are. Two men wh were ill found that they needed som funds and our worker was asked to withdraw funds from the bank in order t aid them. One of the men who was i found that there was danger of hi insurance lapsing, and in his dilemma h called upon our worker, who very gladl adjusted this matter. Six men foun themselves in temporary need of fund and came to our worker, who, with hi committee tided them over.

The relative of one of the boys cam to Des Moines unannounced and it became the duty of our worker to fin work for him.

Conditions at this camp are rathe unsettled, as some of the men are bein transferred to Camp Pike, and other are coming, but efforts are being mad by our director, and by the communit working with him to render as muc service as possible to the men who ar there. Our headquarters here have become the meeting places not only fo the men and the officers, but also fo the Jewish citizens in Des Moines, wh are interested in soldier welfare work The headquarters that have bee equipped offer fine facilities for amusement and recreation and one of the distinctive features of this clubroom is very fine library.

Camp Custer, Battle Creek, Mich.

The work at Camp Custer, which i under the direct supervision of the Michigan Branch of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League of the I. O. B. B has been receiving the attention of man visitors who have visited this camp Mr. Samuel Folz, the chairman of th Michigan branch of the League is rendering noble service for the men i uniform. At his suggestion the Jewis community of Kalamazoo has also interested itself very deeply in the boys o Camp Custer.

One hundred Jewish soldiers from this camp were entertained in the B'na B'rith clubrooms in Kalamazoo. A banquet was served and Mr. Folz gave a address. A number of affairs have bee given in Battle Creek for the boys b the Ladies' Auxiliary Society, and the attendance here has been extremely gratifying. The women of Battle Creek are exerting their best efforts to make the men at Camp Custer forget their homesickness and the monotony of their duties and the director of our headquarters has rendered them every assistance.

Our worker there had more than 30 personal interviews in one week with men who found they needed his services and encouragement, and the commanding officer was invited to get into communication with our director any time that his services might be of use. Three cases of distress claimed his attention. The duties of our headquarters director are manifold in Battle Creek, as in other places. He has had to arrange the various affairs for the soldiers, arrange for services and in some cases even to look into the matter of distributing sweaters and knitted articles for the Jewish soldiers, whose friends made them and sent them to him. In one case it was found that an alien had been drafted into the army, and after some conferences he was given a certificate of discharge. There were some cases of dissatisfaction in this camp, and when our director spoke to the men and pointed out that every man must do his bit, there was a better feeling.

Camp Grant, Rockford, Ill.

Two outstanding events mark our work at Rockford during the month of December. One was the dedication of our headquarters on Nov. 25. More than 300 soldiers were in attendance. The people of Rockford were invited and in a special train from Chicago came many members of our Order from that city. Among the speakers were Col. H. O. S. Heistand, Adjutant General; Sigmund Livingston of Bloomington, Ill., chairman of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League; the Hon. Robert Rew, mayor of Rockford, Judge Philip Stein of Chicago; Dr. George Fox, Executive Secretary of our League; the Rev. C. P. Connolly of Rockford, and A. E. Schulein, one of the leading Jewish residents of Rockford, who was chairman for the occasion. The famous 343rd Regimental Band, led by Bandmaster Price, contributed several selections, and at the close played the "Star Spangled Banner".

A New Idea of God

By

Dr. Max L. Margolis

(Written for the B'nai B'rith News)

I have before me a booklet, written apparently by a liberal Christian minister, which offers to the world a new idea of God. As I lay the book aside I must concede that it is written in a lucid style. It is meant to be understood by the people. It must also be acknowledged that the writer is a serious-minded man. But when all that is said, there is not much else to be pronounced in favor of the book. Had I chanced upon it in my younger days I might have said, A capital book. To warn young men and to give them the benefit of maturer thought these lines are penned.

The chief objection to the old view of God is that the Deity is invested with a monarchial character unsuitable to these days of democracy. God is spoken of in the liturgy and hymnology as a King seated upon a throne. We do not believe in kings. It reminds me of the American English translations of the Bible in which the phrase "God save the king" has been altered to read, "Long live the king". The "king" could not be gotten rid of, but the English acclamation of royalty could not be left in an American Bible. Within our own memory an ex-Jew has been kind enough to offer to surround God with a parliament. For if we have broken with autocracy in earthly government and democracy and constitutions are the watchwords of modern politics, we should not want absolutism to remain in power in heaven. Of course, there may be heretics who are quite disenchanted with democracy. Not that a return to absolutism were desirable. But somehow we feel the difference between the real democracy, which is largely still in the making, and the make-believe democracies as they exist today. The faces of the poor may be ground quite as much in a democracy as they were in absolutistic countries. Nor does it make any difference whether the oligarchy that does the actual ruling is a hereditary aristocracy or a coterie of multi-millionaires. Then again, the phrase has been uttered that we, that is, the Entente, are fighting to make the world safe for democracy. In a measure, it is quite true, and no one will gainsay it. Yet there is a deeper meaning to it, and the whole purpose by no means lies on the surface. Now all nations among the belligerents honestly believe in the righteousness of their cause. And we should not be patriots were we for a moment to waver in that view. But what is to be the function of the church, of religious bodies, of religion in all of it? It is quite right for the church to join in patriotic demonstrations. Only it must be confined to a legitimate sphere. Pray, by all means, for the success of our arms and for the welfare of our soldiers, and do not make yourself ridiculous by pleading pacifism. But religion must not countenance self-righteousness. True, piety is extremely humble and modest. It is impious to approach God—I almost said the throne of God—in a tone of self-satisfied righteousness. Were I a preacher I would frame my patriotic prayer somewhat in this fashion: "O Lord, Thou alone art just, and we men are sinners. With Thee alone is light, and we dwell in darkness. This nation has gone into war. We believe that our cause is righteous, but we may be in error. We take the war as a visitation from Thy hands. We pray Thee that Thou wilt be with our warriors, sustain us in the hour of grief", etc.

Yes, we men are sinners. But the author before me refuses to grant that men are sinners. He works himself up into a state of excitement over this culmination of mankind. He recalls the average man and woman as he knows them and denies that in any of their shortcomings they mean to be rebellious. That is quite true. But whether they be rebellious or not, it cannot be gainsaid that they fall short of the ideal. With all misdeeds it is a question of motive solely. And while the fewest mean to be rebellious, all of us are thoughtless, and all of us too indolent to think of the consequences of our actions. The author admits that we do not carry our religion which we profess on Sunday (or Saturday) into the week; that our business and other activities are carried on without any thought of God. I quite agree with him that there ought not to be this cleavage, that all life ought to be hallowed. Nevertheless, it is a question whether without the impetus which comes to us through worship even on one day of the week life would be less selfish and more pure. Judaism indeed conceives life and religion as united. They must not be severed. Religion cannot be concentrated in the house of worship and for one hour only. And what the author says about the average preaching is quite true. It must be of the safe kind. And it usually is. But still the institution is there. Given a fearless man, he will not refrain from using his office to rebuke and to warm. The fault is not with the institution; the fault is with those complacent self-seekers in the pulpit. It is true that the church seemingly connives at social injustice; that those that grind the faces of the poor occupy the front seats in the house of God and are clothed with church offices. But the church rightly believes that human nature cannot be done away with; it may, however, be curbed. And to the curbing of the unsocial instincts the church is bending all its efforts. And pray, how is it in the liberal churches, and in the ethical societies? Are their members purer, nobler? Are the employers of labor among them less exacting, less exploiting? Are they less rich?

But the burden of the book is taken up with the notion that the old idea of God exhausts itself in describing Him as one working from without, by whose fiat the world came into being and by whose word the right is ordained. The new God is the one who works from within. We remember the cheap witticism of the heathen at Welmar about the God who pushes from without. Our author wants God to be identified with the Life-force that determines the evolution from within. Now, he is by no means the first to have advanced this concept. We did not have to wait for the novelist, Wells, nor for the dramatist, Shaw, and all that ilk to proclaim the new revelation. The late philosopher, Royce, at Harvard, long ago believed that he solved the mystery of suffering by declaring that God not merely sympathized with suffering humanity but was actually undergoing the suffering Himself. I told the learned professor at the time that he was simply re-stating in a diluted form the Christian dogma about the suffering on the cross. And our author is quite unambiguous about it. God is daily on the cross. He is a toiler like the rest of us. He suffers like the rest of us. He is actually in need of us. Were it not for us and with our ingenuity He could not accomplish His purposes. Now, it is one thing to say that God uses us as instruments and another to say that He is in need of us. It may be that the Christian conception of God lends itself to this re-statement in terms of evolution, though I doubt that. Judaism will agree with Jesus that God is the God of the living and not a God of the dead. With a dead, inert world He could accomplish nothing. But then, the world of the living is of His creation. God's Omnipotence must not be interpreted after the anology of a human despot. For with God, will and power and thought and love are the same. We Jews shall cling to the notion that God is both within and without. He is without in the sense that the world cannot be identified with Him, does not exhaust Him. As the ideal He remains unapproachable. That is the meaning of the attribute of Holiness. The world as we know it is evil as well as good. A God confined within the world only must necessarily share in all its impurities. The author, with all like-minded thinkers, begs the question when he associates God with the good only. That is a remnant of the old idea of God which somehow asserts itself. You can not escape it. You may, if you choose, conceive the word as Godless. You may dispense with God entirely. That is an honest procedure. But you can not speak of God and then divest Him of all Godhead by merging Him in the world. Now we understand why Maimonides fought so stubbornly against ascribing to God corporeal qualities. He would have protested against pantheism. He would have protested against this modern heresy of "God the Toiler" who resides in the "urge and outreal". And so do we protest likewise. For this new idea of God leaves simply God out in the cold.

ZIONIST ORGANIZATION OF AMERICA.

An extraordinary conference of the Zionists was held at Baltimore on Sunday and Monday, Dec. 16 and 17, 1917, which conference was called for the purpose of devising plans to meet the great opportunity as a result of the British declaration and the capture of Jerusalem by the British army.

Address by Mr. Sig Livingston At Dedication of B'Nai B'Rith Club Rooms for Soldiers, at Rockford, Ill.

"There is no people in all this world who can more fully appreciate the terror and the agony of a small nation, invaded by over-powering nations. In the early epochs of the history of nations, we have the over-powering and mighty nation entering the small country of Palestine, annihilating the Jewish state, of despoliation of their temples, the entering into the sacred precincts of home, the expulsion of its peaceful God-fearing men and women into foreign lands, and then sent out in the world wanderers among the nations, and made orphan children among the nations of mankind. Is the invasion of Belgium, the invasion of Servia, the invasion of France any different? Have not the holy temples again been destroyed? Have not the peaceful homes been entered? Have not men and women been sent into exile away from their own beloved home? The terror and the anguish which must fill the inhabitants of these lands, can well be appreciated by the descendants of that nation which early in history suffered from these unpardonable crimes. The Jew of this country therefore has a double incentive at this time. Loyalty to the country which has given him an equal chance, the land where he at last was privileged to worship as his heart dictated, the land that gave him freedom, and that brought to realization the exile's dream finds earnest response in the Jew. When this, his country, called to its support the men willing to defend it in this world's struggle, the Jew responded with enthusiasm. Even before the draft became effective, in order to test the feeling of the Jew, we had a survey made in a number of cities located in different parts to determine the percentage of volunteers of Jewish faith. For illustration, in one city the Jewish population of serviceable age numbered 40, and there were 22 volunteers. In another city there were five Jews of serviceable age, and there were three of these five that volunteered. In Woodbine, N. J., where the Jewish agricultural colony is located, and where the population is almost all Jews, sufficient had volunteered that the quota under the draft law was one man. The survey altogether showed the favorable response on the part of the Jew. There are today in active service practically 50,000 Jews. This is far in excess of the ratio of the Jewish and non-Jewish citizenry of this country. And why should it not be so? The Jew has gone through the fire of persecution. He knows what it means to be oppressed. He has for centuries wandered from land to land to seek a home of liberty and equality. It has been his dream that the world shall finally be guided by social justice, and that there be one democracy to rule all this world, and that democracy should have its guiding principle, the brotherhoood of man.

In a recent edition of the weekly publication known as "Life" there appears a caricature which attempts to portray the idea that the Jew is wanting in patriotism, that he is not sharing the burdens of this country; that he is shirking military duty; that he is a stranger to the combat in which this land is now enmeshed. Such an utterance is an insult to the 50,000 Jewish boys now in active service, and many of whom are now on the firing line in a foreign land while such a miserable creature as the man in whose brain such caricature found birth, is living at ease and security in the land which these boys are protecting with their life. A man or any concern which attempts to traffic in furthering antagonism between the citizens of this country, the man or the concern which by utterance or by deed attempts to play upon the prejudice of the past, and thereby create an animosity and ill-will against any part of the citizenry of this land, is a coward, and a traitor to the highest principles of Americanism. It is high time that men who make a living in such a disreputable fashion, by ever trying to stir up class hatred, by trying to keep afresh the prejudice and the errors of the past, should be condemned by the American public for their nefarious work which weakens this country in its time of greatest need, by creating class hatred and prejudice, when the demands of the time require every loyal citizen to gird the loins, and to stay the hands of the united manhood of this land, so that unitedly we may fight the foe which threatens the security of the democracies of the world."

THE INCOMPARABLE APPEAL FOR THE RELIEF OF WAR STRICKEN JEWS OF EASTERN EUROPE.

The great heart of American Jewry is moving now to respond to the sorrow and suffering of the Jews of all the world.

New York, the largest Jewish community in the world or in history, through its great Jewish Relief Committee, is marshalling its forces to lead the list of American philanthropy for its people in travail.

Ten million dollars is the sum set for American Jews to raise.

Five million dollars of this sum is allotted to the Jews of New York, which is the metropolis of the universal but scattered Judea.

The Jewish citizens of New York have nobly assumed the splendid obligation, and with royal spirit have engaged to raise not only this sum but another million dollars to provide for a Jewish Welfare Board for the fifty thousand heroic Jewish boys who have gone forth to sacrifice their lives, if need be, for their country's honor and the world's democracy.

The intensive drive is going now, with all the hearts of all the Jews behind it, and with the eyes of their Christian brethren looking on with admiration and pulsing sympathy.

It is, indeed, a noble and beautiful spectacle, this generous expression of national faith, of racial devotion, pride and loyalty that has never faltered or failed in all the history of an illustrious race.

And the case that calls is thrilling with deepest tragedy and irresistible appeal.

The longer the war lasts the graver becomes the situation of the war-stricken Jews in Eastern Europe. The disintegration of the entire political fabric will inevitably add to the suffering of the Jews in the Russian Empire.

Hunger and cold and the dark forces of political chaos surround them. Their needs are so elementary that no man can ever find an excuse for not giving to those who bore the brunt of the battle and are now exposed to famine and starvation and all the horrors of war.

The Jews in Poland, starving to death, can surely not help the Russian Jews. The Jews in Russia cannot possibly help the Jews in the Ukraina, and the latter cannot help the Roumanian Jews.

Every one of them needs help desperately and looks to America to send it.

One of the most eloquent of American Jews has declared: "Every one of us who is in a position to give and does not give, or who can give more than he does give, is actually the gravedigger of Eastern European Jewry"!

No nation has ever fronted an appeal so touching and so thrilling as that which meets the warm-hearted, large-souled people of this race.

They are called upon now to show not only the universal Jewry, but to the whole world, how deep is their devotion to their race in sorrow and danger and how deathless is the tie that binds this indestructible people to one another.

And not to the Jewish race alone, but to all Americans of every race comes this matchless appeal from the smitten East. The tragedy in the East is like the sorrows of Belgium. To that great cry of the stricken in Christian Belgium there were no responses more prompt and generous than those which came from the American Jews, our fellow citizens. The charity of the American Jew knows no narrow limits of race or religion. The cry of the distressed, wherever it comes from, goes to his heart, and his hand travels to his pocket in generous haste.

And so the Christian element of our population should respond as liberally as the Jews themselves to the appeal which is now being made by our American Jews for their unhappy brethren in Eastern Europe. These Jewish citizens who have rallied so nobly to so many Christian charities have a right to expect that Christians should rally now to the most distressful period in the history of the Hebrew race. The whole people of America, regardless of race or religion, should hear that far cry from the agonized East and answer with one voice of human charity.

There is no fear of the result. Touched by such sorrows and fired by such ideals, the most prosperous race of Jews in all the universe and the most generous Christians in the world are not likely to fail or falter in the supreme emergency.

American Jews will raise the ten million dollars which is expected of them, and the incomparable generosity of the New York Jewry and Christianity will oversubscribe its splendid quota in the name of their chosen people and of their fathers' God.—New York "American".

Sketches of Modern Jewish History

IV. Spiritual Progress.

Romance is to history what ivy is to trees. It looks beautiful, but it is injurious, and in the end deadly to the lumber. Such historical ivy is the widespread belief that Moses Mendelssohn aroused the Jews of western Europe from an intellectual trance, and liberated them from spiritual isolation. This statement must not be understood to deny the great influence which the German translation of the Pentateuch, published by the "Sage of Berlin", exercised first on the lives of the German Jews, and by and by also on those of Poland. It is necessary, however, to reduce the valuation of this influence to its proper size.

Up to the end of the eighteenth century, the great majority of the Jews of western Europe limited themselves in their intellectual life to Hebrew studies. Yet, these Jews did not live entirely behind a Chinese wall. Nor was there the tendency to emancipation entirely absent. The Jews of Italy and those of Portuguese descent, living in Amsterdam, and other commercial centers of Europe, always numbered in their midst men of sound secular education. A striking example is the project of David Portaleone of Mantua, who in 1564 planned the establishment of a Jewish university, whose curriculum should comprise both secular and Jewish studies. In the same city of Mantua we find at this time a Jewish opera company, giving performances at the court, and David de Sommis (1527-1590) wrote quite a number of plays in Italian. Moses Di Castellano was a wood engraver of high standing, who in 1521 obtained from the Republic of Venice a copyright for the protection of his woodcuts.

Numerous young men from Germany and Poland went to Italy, especially to Padua, to study medicine. We find this study often hereditary in one family. Loew Winkler of Vienna obtained the degree of doctor of medicine in Padua in 1629. His sons, Jacob and Isaac, obtained their degrees in the same university in 1669, and Isaac's son, Wolf, in 1701. One Loew Ben Benjamin practiced medicine in Fuerth from 1640-1667. His Christian rivals protested against this encroachment upon their privileges, but Loew had the protection of the Bishop of Bamberg, who allowed him, after he had passed examination, before the state's authorities, to continue his practice. He was succeeded by his son, Wolf, who afterwards transferred his domicile to Prague, where he died in 1712. In Frankfurt-am-Main we find the Buxbaum family as medical practitioners for three generations. Wolf Buxbaum graduated in Padua in 1669, his son, Guttmann, in Leyden in 1697, and his grandson, Anschel, was already permitted to enter a German university, obtaining his degree at Giessen in 1729. We find, however, already exceptional cases in the seventeenth century, when German universities permitted Jews to study medicine. Moses Kohen was one of the many fugitives, fleeing from the Cossack massacres in Poland in the seventeenth century to Germany, where he was elected rabbi of Metz. His son, Tobias, obtained through the intercession of the elector of Brandenburg, who immortalized himself in Jewish history by the admission of the Vienna exiles to Berlin, the right to study medicine in Frankfurt-an-der-Oder. His medical work in Hebrew, to which Dr. Levinson of Chicago recently devoted a monograph, still has an important place in medical history. He entered the University of Frankfurt about 1675, and practiced medicine in various places among others in Adrianople.

The practice of medicine was naturally limited to the few large congregations then existing in Germany, Frankfurt-am-Main, Prague, and Fuerth. The physicians who practiced there were pioneers of modernism, and the leaders of the congregations felt that they had to take measures against the heretical influences which might emanate from these men, whose services otherwise were indispensable. So we find that the congregation of Fuerth elects in 1760 Solomon of Bamberg as congregational physician, but stipulates in his contract that he must not shave nor wear a sword, nor a "Zopf Baruck" (pigtail). In order to avoid misunderstanding, it must be said right here that the objection was not due to the suggestive name "pigtail", but to a departure from the mode of dress common among the Jews of that time. It further must be understood that the study of medicine was not regarded as cultural, but as strictly technical, although the student of medicine had to devote himself to secular studies aside from his profession. Typical in this respect is a warning sounded by Jacob Emden of Altona (1696-1776), perhaps the most learned rabbi of his days, who is asked by a medical student of Goettingen whether it was permitted to attend lectures on anatomy on the Sabbath. The rabbi's decision is quite noteworthy as illustrating the viewpoint, even among the progressive Talmudists, as we might classify Emden, on secular studies. In deciding the question, Emden in accordance with the principles of his age, discusses at length the strictly legal side of Sabbath legislation, with regard to the dissecting and the handling of a corpse. In the end, however, he dismisses these considerations, altogether, and says: "Sabbath is given to us as a day of rest, and of religious worship, and therefore it is not material, whether you do any actual work in dissecting a body or not. The real point at issue is, that the spirit of the Sabbath is violated, when you attend an anatomical demonstration instead of devoting the day exclusively to religious thought". Having decided the question from a religious point of view, the rabbi adds a word of admonition. It is perfectly permissible, he says, for a Jew to study medicine. The study is necessary for the preservation of human life, and, therefore, not only permitted, but even meritorious, affording in addition an honest and respectable livelihood. Your studies, however, must be limited to medical subjects, while academic studies, especially philosophy, are not meant for a Jew. They may be useful for "Goyim" who have no Torah, but to Jews they have no meaning. What is good in them has been said long ago by our sages, as Scripture says: "He showeth his words unto Jacob, his statutes and his judgments unto Israel. He has not dealt so with any nation, and for his judgments, they have not known them".

This idea of secular studies, as merely practical, may indeed be considered the general viewpoint of this age. Jair Hayim Bacharach (1636-1702) of Worms, also one of the most enlightened rabbis of his time, in outlining a course of study to the father of a Bar Mizvah, makes no allowance for secular instruction. Exceptions, however, existed even at that time and in that section of the country, for Christoph Wallich of Mayence, a converted Jew, reports that about 1690 he and another Jewish boy attended the public school of his city. It is possible that western Germany presents a more liberal conception of secular studies. One Kalman Cohen of Duesseldorf wrote in 1758 a textbook of commercial arithmetic, which was used as official textbook in the schools of that section, and earned for its author the title of "Priviligierter Rechenmeister". In the same city of Duesseldorf, we find Moses von Geldern, who graduated as doctor of medicine at the University of Duisberg in 1742. His cousin, Gottschalk von Geldern, graduated at the same university ten years later. He was the maternal grandfather of Heinrich Heine. His thesis, which is published, is written in Latin, as is also the thesis of Benjamin Wolf Gintzburger on the medicine in Talmudic literature, on which the author received the degree of doctor of medicine in Goettingen in 1743. He is the young man who submitted his scruples to Rabbi Jacob Emden. The mere fact that these young men wrote their thesis in Latin shows that they must have had other training besides that of medicine. Still, this was not general. In most instances education as cultural training was largely limited to rabbinic studies. The best proof is the case of Heine's grandfather, Dr. Gottschalk von Geldern, whose older brother, Simon, made his studies at the Yeshibah of Frankfurt, became a mystic and went to Jeruslem, from which city he returned several times to Europe as a regular Schnorrer. He died in Forbach, Lorraine, in 1774. Heine, in his usual way, bluffs about that uncle, who according to his statement traveled in the far off Orient, and turned up from time to time in his home, scattering the wealth that he had amassed in his business ventures. This wealth, needless to say, consisted of the harvest that he reaped as a Schnorrer, and which earned him enough to make wedding presents to the members of his family when he returned. The intimate and private life of the masses is not recorded in historical sources. We are, however, justified in assuming that in the second part of the eighteenth century, secular education made considerable progress in Jewish society, although even Heine's mother, Peierche, afterwards euphoniously called Betty, born in 1771, wrote her letters to her son whom she survived always in Yiddish, though as the daughter of a physician the culture of her family was undoubtedly superior to the average of her time and environment.

A proof of the spreading of secular culture at that time is furnished in a letter of Queen Louise Ulrike of Sweden, addressed to her brother, Frederick the Great, in 1772. The queen had attended a Jewish wedding, and expresses her surprise at the number of cultured people that she met there. The impression which she received, so she writes to her brother, was so that she might have believed herself to be in an aristocratic society. Frederick the Great, who, as stated before, was not very fond of the Jews, answers with some sneering remarks. He had noticed before that the Jews had made considerable progress of late in their culture, and he did not wonder at that, because they considered themselves the chosen people of God, and are expecting the Messiah who would give them control of the universe, for which role they are preparing themselves. In the Berlin of Frederick the Great this progress was quite noticeable in those days. Moses Mendelssohn had made his debut as author on philosophy in 1761, and in 1772 a Lithuanian Jew had published a volume of poems. This exceptional character was Issacher Falkensohn Behr of Salatin, government of Kovno, who studied medicine in Germany. His poems, published under the title, "Gedichte eines Polnischen Juden," obtained the high compliment that Goethe reviewed them. This is about the best that can be said of them. They may have been written for certain occasions, dedicated to members of wealthy families in Berlin, who supported the ambitious young man. One of them is addressed to the Itzig family, which numbered nine daughters. The poet enthusiastically compares these young ladies to the Nine Muses, and records their protest that they are no muses, but "I's daughters". This answer shows the difficulty in which these cultured Jews were placed. On one hand they were Germans, admirers of music, art, and poetry, and on the other hand—their name was Itzig. Daniel Itzig (1723-1799), the father, had made a considerable fortune by horse contracts for the army. He was a strictly observant Jew. His son, Isaac Daniel Itzig (d. 1807), became a wealthy silk manufacturer, being in business with his brother-in-law, David Friedlaender, both leaders in the progressive movement of the Berlin congregation. His son, Julius Edward (1780-1849), assumed the more euphonious name of Hitzig, and became an author on criminal law, the grandson, Georg Heinrich Hitzig (1811-1881), was an architect who—this may be a case of atavism—immortalized himself in Berlin as the architect of the stock exchange building, and the great grandson, Julius Edward Hitzig (1838-1909), was professor of psychiatrics in Halle. The family has become entirely estranged from Judaism and counts amongst its descendants quite a number of people with aristocratic names as a countess of Fries, and a Count of Coudenhove, the latter descendants of Fanny Itzig, one of the nine muses, who married the banker Nathan Adam Arnstein of Vienna. Another sister married Arnstein's partner, Baron Bernhard von Eskeles, the son of the previously mentioned honorary Landesrabbiner of Moravia, Berusch Eskeles, and grandson of the rabbi of Metz and Nikolsburg, Gabriel Eskeles, of Cracow. Bernhard von Eskeles died as Jew in 1838. He was succeeded in his firm by his son, Daniel, named for the grandfather, Daniel Itzig, but afterward as a Catholic named Dennis, who lost his fortune through unfortunate speculations in the war of 1859, but retained his standing in the aristocracy by the marriage of his daughters to members of the aristocratic families of Austria, one of whom was the illustrious general, Baron von Gablonz.

We return from the history of these nine muses to the Berlin society where they grew up. Behr was not the first Jew to write German poetry. He was preceded by Moses Ephraim Kuh (1721-1790) of Breslau, whose epigrams still possess some merit. He was a nephew of Veitel Heine Ephraim, the banker of Frederick the Great, and entered his uncle's business. He was, however, not fitted for business, and otherwise an eccentric character, who ended in an insane asylum. In his own family, he was the only one to die as a Jew. All others converted to Christianity, as was the case with the descendants of Veitel Heine, among whom the novelist and Egyptologist, Georg Ebers, obtained international fame.

All these cases mentioned present individuals who are only in so far typical as they show us the endeavor of the Jews to merge from their spiritual isolation. The community at large still remained attached to the traditional modes of education. In 1734, one of the occasional complaints about the rapid increase of the Jewish population of Berlin reached the king's ear. An investigation was begun, which showed that a great number of "unvergleitete" (not possessing right of residence) Jews were living in Berlin. The congregation, which had police power, and was responsible for the enforcement of the restrictive laws, was asked to explain. The trustees answered that these "unvergleitete" Jews were teachers, who had to be imported from Poland. It was then, and at a much later date the general rule to employ Polish Jews as tutors. Even Mendelssohn employed Solomon of Dubnow, afterwards his co-worker in the edition of the Pentateuch, as tutor of his oldest son. It is equally typical that up to 1812 the records of the Berlin congregation were kept in Yiddish.

The change of sentiment, however, becomes apparent from the numerous complaints found in the rabbinical literature during the last decades of the eighteenth century. Joseph Hirsch, rabbi of Margonin, now province of Posen, says in the introduction to a book which he published in Leghorn, 1779, "I have not learned anything of the books of the philosophers, for they are not worth studying. They are so light that the wind will carry them away. The most insignificant of the scholars of Israel, if placed on a scale, would outweigh all of them. The little good that is found in them can be duplicated from every verse of the Bible, and every passage in the Talmud". Similar is the view taken by Rabbi Saul Loewenstamm of Amsterdam, in the preface to an apologetic work, written by Judah Horwitz of Wilna in 1766, and even his colleague, the Haham of the Portuguese congregation of Amsterdam, Solomon Salem, joins in the condemnation of people who study secular literature and neglect the Torah. Simon Copenhagen of Bonn in a booklet which describes a flood of the Rhine in 1784, makes an allusion to a Hebrew book on metaphysics, published previously by Herz Ulma of Mayence, and punning on the author's name, he says with an allusion to a rabbinical passage, that if one is inclined to become an infidel, Satan will open for him the portals of his temple (Ulma).

The greatest rabbinical scholar of that period was Hayim Joseph David Azulai (1723-1806), a native of Jerusalem, who, after traveling all over Europe, in the interest of the Palestinian Jews, settled in Leghorn, then one of the wealthiest congregations of Europe, whence he directed the relief work for the poor of the Holy Land. Leghorn was always a cultured community. The German author, Johann Heinse, who visited Leghorn in 1781 speaks of the surprising impression which he received, when coming in contact with the local Jews, who neither in their language nor in their manners betray the Jew. Azulai, in a work published in 1793, speaks repeatedly of the decline of religion, saying that the people have no Hebrew book in their library except a dilapidated Pentateuch or a prayer book, that they neglect the Torah and study philosophy, not appreciating the fact that Satan is the most expert philosopher, who uses philosophical arguments to make skeptics out of good Jews, whom he seduces to become lax in religious practices, telling them that philosophic training will confirm religious faith, and make them better Jews. The real intention of such people, however, is not to become better Jews, but to mimic the Christians. They do not change their dress on Sabbath. go Friday evening to the cafe, or to the club, attend costume balls, ridicule cabalistic practices, like the vigil of Shabuoth night. First they claim to oppose Cabbala as a misrepresentation of Judaism, and glory in Maimonides' rationalism, but soon afterwards the Torah is neglected altogether. These liberals play chess and cards until late at night, go to theaters and circuses, winding up the evening with a supper, and in consequence rise late in the morning, indifferent to the time of prayer, neglect the synagogue, and perform their devotions perfunctorily. Disraeli and the British Commonwealth

By ABRAHAM CAPLAN, Baltimore

The movement to substitute the term "The British Commonwealth" for that of "The British Empire" is not a mere impulse. There is absent in that movement the hasty sense of pious determination that comes upon individuals and nations in times of trial. The notion has a historic continuity. Contrasted with German ante-bellum political philosophy, it takes on a most suggestive significance. It is only a phrase, but an illuminating one. An expression that lends itself to easy utterance by the lips of men and is comprehended by them may have tremendous effect on human progress. "The state—it is I" was a formula that did not go very far. Its repetition by the present German emperor, in substance, if not in exactly the same form, is an illustration of twentieth century humor that is almost lungless. It is about to die. But "equality and fraternity", however badly distorted by disingenuous politicians and the untutored masses, represents a truth the vitality of which is to be observed in the unseemly welter of the great war. There is in this movement of re-designating the name under which Great Britain is henceforth to go a consciously earnest effort to express in popular phraseology a historic tendency that, if not very old, is nevertheless the most potent influence in the development of human liberty and free institutions.

The British Empire, the most wonderful aggregation of peoples that the world has ever known, has for the last one hundred years prosecuted a beneficent attitude in the politics of the world. Old-school British imperialism came to an end with England's defeat in the War of 1812. The lesson England learned in the course of its relations with the American colonies she took to heart. She realized the difference between selfish imperialism and enlightened expansion. England took to ideas. Its policy of expansion was thenceforth dictated, first of all, by a sense of practical wisdom and secondly by a consciousness of the irresistible growth of democratic forces. The reaction on British political philosophy set in motion by the triumph of American independence was not short-lived. The concept of expansion on the necessary basis of free self-government and self-determined autonomy was incorporated in whole into the structure of British political ethics. The sense of expediency was but a step in the direction of a still higher concept. Great Britain became enamored of the work of freeing humanity, of spreading to remote people's the doctrine of human rights and of making permanent and generally clear the basic elements of free government. For free government has been with the English people a historic passion—a passion that in the nineteenth century received an intellectual stamp and general application.

In the course of the same century, however, the power that at this point is taking its last and hopeless stand before the hosts of human right saw its rise and growth and its mirage in the form of a challenging destiny. The defeat the Prussians received at the hands of Napoleon at Jena awakened in them the feeling that, if anything was to come of the purpose on which the early Prussian kings had set their hearts, they would have to put in motion the as yet hazy scheme that would lead to their imperialistic goal. That Prussian imperialism was wholly sinister and possessed of black purpose needs but passing emphasis. The philosophy of Fichte and the internal social and educational schemes he fathered had only one thing for their object. They contemplated that sort of a national solidarity that could be used with the utmost ease by the designing ruling class. Fichte's sociology was inherently local and Prussian and could have no applicability elsewhere. It is hardly to be doubted that Fichte was aware of what he was doing and that he was elaborating a so-called phliosophy the goal of which was not to apprehend general values but to enable an increasingly dangerous military power to become more dangerous. And what Fichte auspiciously began German philosophers, great and small, slavishly and joyously furthered.

Napoleon's defeat at Waterloo, to which Prussia contributed its share, has, if carefully considered, meant little for Europe. For Prussia it has meant a great deal. The worst thing that happened to Europe in the last century was the participation of Blucher and his lustful legions in that significant battle on the plains of now outraged Belgium. Prussia did not fight for the liberty of Europe. Altruism never dominated Prussia's political motives. What Prussia really did was to put itself in the position of carrying out freely and in an unmolested way its own and infinitely more dangerous designs. The Battle of Waterloo was hardly the decisive engagement we thoughtlessly imagine it was. While it put an end to the Napoleonic wars and to Napoleon's audacious purposes, it gave powerful impetus to the Prussian dream of conquest that was even then on its way of slow unfoldment. The Battle of Waterloo merely changed the scene of Europe's menace from France to Prussia.

The difference between Napoleon's method and that of the Prussian kings throughout the nineteenth century is obvious. Napoleon was open, spectacular, conscious of his powers and of his defects. He was a marvelous soldier, but at the same time he possessed the practical sense that, were he successful, might have gone a long way to amend for his destructive work. He was, however, no Genseric, after whom the Prussian rulers patterned. The Prussian kings were more sinister, more diabolical and possessed of a more thoroughgoing menace. With colossal intrigue, insinuation and perfidy they ate their way into the vitals of European nations. They translated every agency of enlightenment into a tool of hate and menace. They manipulated every lie of which they were capable to serve as a furtherance of their imperialistic plan. This cajoled the German states into what is their irreparable doom. They insinuated themselves into nations far and near, to the end that resistance would be ineffectual. They capitalized the ingenuous praise which they exacted from distant and trustful peoples so that they could the more easily present themselves as the superior and dominant race. Back of it all was the basest selfishness, the grossest materialism, the most repellant rapacity into which a nation could steep itself.

This contrast between Great Britain engaged in the process of consolidating its vast dominions into a union of free, autonomous states and Prussia determined on manacling by force and base diplomacy those countries that haplessly fell before her blandishments is the outstanding feature of European politics in the last century. Unfortunately for Europe and for the world, few were the statesmen who divined the possible crisis to which these two divergent forces would lead. For they might have given the alarm and put a halt to the progress of Prussian machinations. However, there did appear on the scene the man in whom there was combined the genius for practical statecraft with the power to discern great forthcoming contingencies, in whom there surged a passion for human freedom. That man was Benjamin Disraeli.

Disraeli was the most romantic political figure of the last century. That he was misunderstood, misinterpreted and feared by the politicians adds suggestiveness to the profound part he played in the politics of the world. There are times and conditions when politicians find it suited to their purpose to do naught else but doubt and fear positive statesmanship. Disraeli was a statesman who knew his object. Call him a Tory, and the designation partially suggests that his policy was that of establishing an order of things that would yield a fulsome bounty of justice and prosperity, a condition of affairs that would be free from the errors of rash political dogmatism. However constructive his measures for internal situations may have been, it is more important to consider Disraeli as one of the creative factors in the development of England's broad foreign policy. In his attitude toward international affairs he, of course, reflected the unbendable Jew that he was. In this role he did more for the good name of England than in any other. In shaping British foreign policy he put Great Britain into the position of guardian of the world's liberties, a position which the imperialism had necessarily caused Great Britain to assume. But what Disraeli did was to give that attitude the breath of conscious idealism. The foreign policy of a nation, rather than its internal policy, reflects the idealism or lack of idealism of that nation. It is inconceivable that wise internal political measures would not hold pace with an enlightened and constructive view of international relations. Where a foreign policy is dark and sinister internal policies are essentially negative, and, if apparently enlightened, are nevertheless open to suspicion.

Disraeli's work was that of supplying to England not only the territorial and political supremacy in the East but the consciousness that the great and determining struggle would center around the Orient and its significant prizes. In this work is evident the Oriental heritage which dominated Disraeli's life and point of view and caused his contemporaries to misunderstand him. "He was thoroughly and unchangeably a Jew. He had 'none of the hereditary prepossession of the native Englishman.' He was an Englishman in nothing but his devotion to England and his solicitude for her honor and prosperity". He was more than that. He was of the conviction that there were great dangers yet to be met—greater, perhaps, than the generality of English statesmen realized. He knew the Teutonic bent of mind, not so much as a result of intimate contact with men and things Teutonic, but as something that was definitely in contrast with the ingenuous nature of the Anglo-Saxon mind. He, of course, could delve beneath the superficial finesse of European diplomacy. He divined in Prussia's tendencies the surpassing menace to the peoples in the East as well as to the nations of Europe. In thwarting Russian designs in the near East Disraeli realized that he was doing more than checking Russia. He was aware of the peculiarly advantageous position of Prussia in the politics of Central Europe and of the ultimate triumph of Prussia over the less aggressive rulers of Austria and Russia if Prussia's objective in the near East were not kept from her. In subduing Russia Disraeli became the stumbling block in the advance of Prussia upon the Orient.

Disraeli may not have been the first to suggest the purchase of the Suez Canal, but there was no man in all England who was better aware of its strategic importance. His work in giving to Queen Victoria the title of Empress of India was based on the conviction that the integrity of India as well as the completeness of his imperialistic policy depended upon England's control of the Suez Canal. But Disraeli's imperialistic policy, it must be understood, had its idealistic aspect. Disraeli's imperialism was the outgrowth of his conviction that successful government was based upon freedom. As a democratic Tory, if such a term may be allowed, Disraeli espoused the cause of liberty for the individual as well as for nations. He was consistent throughout. The development of his administrative policies was founded on this controlling conviction as well as on a high regard for intelligent discernment. To this attitude Disraeli brought the added conviction, arrived at after mature introspection, that of all powers Great Britain was best fitted and most earnestly inclined to construct for the world and to defend, if necessary, the principle of free government and liberty to the individual and to nations. Disraeli was, above all, an enthusiast. Removed from the trivial aspersions to which he was subjected by narrow-minded political opponents and from the perhaps unkind raillery of party associates, he stands out as a statesman full-visioned and inspired by a sound and beneficent internationalism. Disraeli the Jew certainly looked forward to approximately that state of world affairs for which the underlying passion of the Jewish people yearned. Disraeli the Englishman contemplated, as the first step in the direction of a peaceful adjustment of the world's affairs, a harmonious commonwealth of peoples to which the English genius of government could give definite form and character. Disraeli the imperialist was, all things considered, if not the first, at least the fullest-visioned and the most constructive builder of the British Commonwealth.

In the nature of the case such a concept as that of the British Commonwealth represents one of the truly romantic movements in the history of international politics. Political romanticism means aspiration toward international uprightness and the peace of the world. The unquestioned solidity of the British Empire in the great war proves that a commonwealth of nations is more than a possibility. That a league of nations, however disparate in racial and intellectual character but informed by a common democracy and mutual feelings, can subsist needs no labored testimony. Those who doubt that universal peace may some day come should consider that a quarter of the earth's surface already is welded together in an unbreakable comity. Once a positive democracy is diffused, the nations of the world will be ready to enter upon the glorious era to which the war is perhaps the necessary prelude. It is hardly necessary to insist that just as long as the outworn notions of autocracy remain they will stand in the way of the world-wide brotherhood. Freedom and autocracy are implacable enemies. [illegible] these must succumb. Need it [illegible] that in the end freedom will [illegible]

The British Commonwealth, [illegible] political concept, has its ethical [illegible] tiveness. Disraeli certainly [illegible] make that suggestiveness real and potent. There was nothing in the mental make-up of Disraeli to suggest that his imperialism was to stubbornly insist upon an undifferentiated aggregate of nations to be moulded into a vast unwilling community. That he was, as he forces one to conclude, ethically and intellectually a Jew and at the same time a British imperialist is sufficient proof that his imperialism was saturated with a democratic fervor. Disraeli the imperialist emphasized, as perhaps no one else, that imperialism may be free from the terrors that are historically associated with that term. He gave to imperialism a new and vital interpretation. He saw in the growing unity of the British Empire the reward for its recognition of the right and the necessity of its component parts to regulate their own affairs. In that unity also he saw the promise of a still wider growth of the idea of an international commonwealth, the goal of which is the commonwealth of the world. As a political seer he discerned in the onward sweep of British imperialism the power that would give rise to an organization of free nations whose purpose it would be to realize the condition of universal brotherhood.

That Disraeli had an uncommon gift of vision can be proven easily. What statesman of his time had a broader grasp than he of political conditions and tendencies outside of the British Empire? No prime minister since his day has displayed finer leadership, earnestness and discernment in grappling with the broader aspects of British imperialism. No British statesman should be judged, so far as treatment of purely internal English questions is concerned, so generously as Disraeli. For it must be understood that Disraeli, while a more or less strict adherent of the Conservative party, more than once rose above his party and demonstrated his superior capacity for constructive statecraft. Whether or not he always showed political munificence in questions of concern to England alone, he did excel in his broad-gauged attitude toward Great Britain's foreign policy and toward her imperialism. If he erred in questions of political and social economy, he compensated for his errors in his prophetic and determined outlook on affairs that were world-wide in scope.

Disraeli was a romantic figure because the apparently paradoxical nature of his mind made it hard for superficial observers to sense his passion for justice and uprightness. Disraeli was the romantic leader of a still more romantic movement—the movement to establish the British Commonwealth as the basis for the bigger universal commonwealth. His nature and heritage naturally tended to direct his mind toward attitudes that aim to encompass an appreciably ideal status of the world's affairs. If he occasionally gave way to political expediencies and trivialities, he nevertheless remained loyal to the high visions which doubtless stirred his being. His unquestioned morality is his security. Such morality was incompatible with an imperialism that aimed at selfish power and prestige. It is not to be wondered that he was the man who gave to British imperialism its ideal substance. What Great Britain needed most was a leader who could bring to the indigenous capacity of the English people to govern and to teach others to govern themselves the universalistic aspect, the loftier vision, a gripping passion for service to the whole world. As a Jew Disraeli possessed that special moiety of idealism that has helped the British Empire to become the British Commonwealth.—Jewish Comment.

DEFENDING THE GOOD NAME OF THE JEW.

The recent action of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith and other fraternal organizations of Philadelphia adopting resolutions condemning the remarks of Judge Charles L. Brown, who during the hearing of a murder case cast reflections upon Jewish character, should be highly commended.

The judge is alleged to have stated: "That Jews, bearing Irish names, have been brought before him for crimes which no Irishman would ever commit".

A failure on the part of the people of Philadelphia to openly and actively resent an untruthful and unwarranted statement of this nature would have proved a dereliction deserving extreme censure.

We are glad to note that the B'nai B'rith vigilantly performed its proper function in this case, and will ever prove foremost in defending the name and character of the Jew.—American Jew Review.

THE PSALMISTS

Ninth Essay in the Series of Historical Portraits of Jewish Leaders, by Rabbi Samuel S. Cohon, Chicago

As the genii of the forest sing through the full-throated lark and nightingale, so the genius of a nation expresses itself through the poet's voice. Indeed, poets are to their people what songbirds are to the woodland. Their melodies thrill all hearts and fill them with lasting joy. Even before emerging from barbarism and before acquiring the art of writing, the nations treasured the songs of their bards and transmitted them orally from generation to generation. Due to the skill of the poets, the ancient traditions, proverbs, and even laws, were saved for later ages. Rhyme and rhythm are strong preservatives. They catch the ear and live in the mind long after a story or word of counsel is forgotten.

In Israel, as in many other nations, the earliest literary products were transmitted through the art of its poets. Snatches of their song found refuge from oblivion in the narratives of the historical books of the Bible. The Song of the Sword (Genesis iv:23-24), the Song of the Well (Numbers xxi:17-18) and numerous other fragments of folk ditties, riddles and war songs are like echoes of another world. The Song of the Sea (Exodus xv), the Ode of Deborah (Judges v), the extracts from the lost "Book of the Wars of Yahweh" (Numbers xxi:27-30), and the "Book of Jasher" (Joshua x:12-13; 2 Samuel i:18-17) celebrate the exploits of Israel's early heroes. The Blessings of Jacob (Genesis xlix) and of Moses (Deuteronomy xxxiii) present the characters and geographic positions of Israel's tribes. The Oracles of Bala'am describe the political relations between Israel and the East-Jordan nations during the period of the monarchy.

Not only the past of Israel, but its land also is forever enshrined in poetry. Palestine is naturally a home of song. About two thousand species of flowers are said to have grown there. A modern writer tells that he was lost in delight over the anemones, cyclamens, asphodels and iris which rose to his view in the Gilead as he rode "knee-deep through the long, rich, sweet-grass". There flourished the oak and the terebinth, the orange and the citron, the fig and the pomegranaite, the date-palm and the walnut, the olive and the vine. Grain of all varieties covered its lower plateaus, broad valleys and plains. That tiny land lying between the desert to the East and the Mediterranean Sea to the West unites all possible climatic contrasts. Its mountains to the North are capped with eternal snow; its regions to the South are sub-tropical in climate and vegetation. It was a land flowing not only with milk and honey, but with song as well. Three hundred fifty species of birds, twenty-six of which are peculiar to that country, filled the air of Palestine with music. A land so varied, so rich in color, and so vibrant with melody was created for poets. Her hills were girded with gladness; her valley shouted for joy.

Only such a land could have inspired man to sing the Song of Songs, that wondrous masterpiece wherein "the spring of nature and of love has been caught and fixed in its many exquisite lines". The pure delight in which the lover sings to his beloved reflects the soul of the people and of the land. Professor Cornill writes: "They must have been a people of an unusually musical temperament, whose daily nourishment was song and sound" (Music in the Old Testament, The Monist, vol. XIV, p. 241). They have always been lovers of music. From times immemorial they have known of stringed and wind instruments, as well as of percussive instruments. Among the great benefactors of civilization, their traditions include Jubal, "the father of all such as handle the harp and pipe" (Genesis iv:21). Like their Egyptian and Assyro-Babylonian neighbors, they delighted in the rhythmic beat of the timbrel and the clash of the cymbal in their dances. They were roused to public duty by the shrill blasts of the ram's horn. And they sang praises to the Most High "with an instrument of ten strings, and with the psaltry, with a solemn sound upon the harp" (Psalm xcii:2-4). They enlivened their labors and drove away dulness while sowing, reaping, watching the flock or drawing water, with melodious chants. Sacrificial meals, marriages, funerals, sheep-shearing, vintage gathering and all public functions were not thought of without vocal and instrumental music. The living voice came first. Instruments were known as "Kele hashir—instruments of song," i. e., used as accompaniment for singing; and musicians were called "singers". (Ibid; also W. O. E. Oesterley, The Psalms in the Jewish Church, chap. II-IV).

The Hebrew singers had no great difficulty in clothing truth in the forms of beauty, for their language is peculiarly fit for poetic expression. It is wondrously rich in words, full of imagry, of emotion and of action. Even the prose parts of the Bible are picturesque, dramatic and melodious; and the whole prose history of ancient Israel reads like a grand epic poem. Hebrew poetry differs from the poetry of other languages in that it is free from rhyme and metre. Its distinguishing characteristic is a strong and natural rhythm, making itself felt in the cadence of each separate clause, as well as in the balance of clauses within the verse. The terse clauses offer effective media for conveying the changing moods of the soul. Hebrew poetry is enriched by assonance and alliteration and principally by the balanced symmetry of form and sense, which goes under the name of Parallelism. In this "balancing of the parts of a sentence, one against the other", the equilibrium depends on the thought rather than on the sound. Hence, parallelism has been called "sense rhythm" or "thought rhythm", as distinguished from rhyme or metre. This simple artifice was learned from nature herself. "It is", writes Henry Van Dyke, "the rise and fall of the fountain, the ebb and the flow of the tide, the tone and the overtone of the chiming bell. The two-fold utterance seems to bear the thought onward like the wings of a bird. A German writer compares it very exquisitely to 'the heaving and sinking of the troubled heart'." This freedom of form has rendered Hebrew poetry well adapted to antiphonal chanting and easy translation into other languages. Though denuded in the process of translation of its native graces and characteristic word-play, Hebrew poetry can be rendered into all languages almost unimpaired. Even its outward dress, i. e., its parallelism, can be carried into the speech of all nations with comparatively little difficulty. Thus Hebrew poetry, by its very nature and form, has lent itself to become the poetry of all humanity.

What especially distinguishes the songs of Israel from the songs of other nations, even more than their naturalness, is their religiousness. Even the love poems of the Bible exhibit the ethical tone of sacrifice and self-effacement "which all love must have to be thoroughly worthy". It is chaste love purified by religion of which the Hebrew bard sings. Rightly could Israel say: "He hath put a new song in my mouth, even praise unto our God; many shall see and fear and shall trust in the Lord" (Psalm xl:4). This quality of Hebrew poetry recommended it to the hearts of all mankind and rendered it universal, for, in Homer's words; "Dear to God and men is sacred song".

Poetry was the favorite vehicle of the Prophets' preaching. They borrowed its flowers of speech and its artistic forms for the expression of their sublime thoughts. Their books are collections of rhetorical-didactic verse. Poetic fragments are strewn also over the non-Prophetic books of the Bible. In addition there is a collection of one hundred fifty religious lyrics, known as the Psalter, or the Book of Psalms, which represents the ripest product of Israel's song. The word Psalm, derived from the Greek and signifying a composition rendered to the accompaniment of a stringed instrument, is the equivalent of the Hebrew Mizmor and Tehillah (in the plural Tehillim, and in shortened form Tillim), "employed in the technical language of the Temple service for the execution of a jubilant song of praise to the accompaniment of music and the blare of priestly trumpets" (1 Chronicles xv:4 seq. xxv:3; 2 Chron. v:12 seq. See W. R. Smith, Encyc. Brit. xxii, p. 534). Though not all the Psalms give indication of having been set to music, they are all "songs of praise", beginning with the praise of the righteous man and ending with a diapason of Hallelujahs to God. Of their high excellence, Milton, England's loftiest master of poetic art, wrote: "Not in their divine arguments alone, but in the very critical art of composition, the Psalms may be easily made to appear over all kinds of lyric poetry, incomparable". Professor F. Delitzsch fittingly said: "What the heart is to the human body the Psalms are to the Bible". Prof. H. C. Cornill expressed a universal sentiment in stating that the Psalms belong "to the most precious treasures among the spiritual possessions of mankind".

Who were the authors of these sacred lyrics? Uncritical tradition ascribes their composition to the royal bard, David. When still a shepherd in the wilds of Judah he won fame for his song. As minstrel he was brought to the court of Saul to soothe the melancholy king with his melodies. As king he gave a great impetus to the musical development of the nation, surrounding himself with male and female singers (2 Sam. xix:36). Upon establishing his capital at Jerusalem and transferring the Ark to that city, he instituted regular divine worship. As this consisted of song as well as of sacrifice, he doubtless devoted his poetic ability to the composition of hymns for the service. Psalm eighteen, ascribed to him also in 2 Samuel xxii, is an unmistakable product of his genius. From the strings of his heart many other songs have rung out, which in whole or in part, possibly revised and modified by later hands, are imbedded in the Psalter. It was not without cause that later generations cherished his memory as "the sweet singer of Israel". That he merited this reputation may be gathered from his elegy, composed at the death of Saul and Jonathan (2 Samuel i:17-27), which still ranks with the finest of its kind in literature, and from other fragments of his song (2 Samuel ii:32-33; xxiii:1-7; see also Amos vi:5). However, that he did not compose all of the Psalms is clear from the unmistakable allusions made in several of them to events which took place many centuries after his death (Psalms cxxvi, cxxxii, cxxxvii, etc.), and from the fact that many of them are ascribed to Asaph, the poet and chief of Choirs under David, to the Levitical family of singers, to the sons of Korah and to others. Tradition itself, critically examined, makes David the founder of the Psalmody rather than the author of the whole Psalter (see Midrash Rabba to Song of Songs IV).

"The Praises of Israel" were composed by a whole array of gifted singers. "What is best written or done by genius in the world", writes Emerson, "was no man's work, but came down by wide social labor when a thousand wrought like one, sharing the same impulse". Our Bible is the product of the collective genius of Israel. Prophet, priest, sage and saint contributed their grains of gold to this great treasure of religious thought. Also the Bible within the Bible, the Book of Psalms, with its wondrous music, poetic range, philosophic depth of mystic force, is the anthology of ages of song and devotion of the whole nation. To this sanctuary of the spirit the great seers and singers of human hope and destiny brought a heave offering of the first fruit of their genius. There one hears echoes of the preaching of Amos (see Psalms cxxxix:7-12 and Amos ix:2-4), and clearly distinguishes the voice of Jeremiah (see Psalm i and Jeremiah xviii:5-8; Psalm lxv:7-8, and Jeremiah x:12-13, etc.), and the ringing notes of Deutero-Isaiah (of Psalm xcvi-xcviii, and Isaiah xlii:10 ff., etc).

The Psalms take on the form of hymns in praise of God's glory as revealed in the universe, in the life of man, in the destinies of Israel and of humanity, and in the moral law. Many of them are of a national nature, singing of Zion and Jerusalem and extolling the ideal king. A large number of Psalms consist of admonitions, philosophic reflections on life, lyrics expressing the religious sentiments of the human heart. odes of thanksgiving and prayers for divine mercy and guidance.

This large variety of subjects represents the spiritual labor of many ages. Prof. S. Driver, summarizing the best results of modern scholarship, says that while several of the Psalms come from pre-Exilic times, "the Psalter as a whole is the expression of the deeper spiritual feeling which marked the later stages of Israel's history. It has not inaptly been termed the hymn book of the Second Temple. Its compilation can hardly have been finally completed before the third century B. C. E.; while, if it is true, as many scholars think, that there are Psalms dating from the time of the Maccabean struggle (Psalms xliv, lxxiv, lxxix, lxxxiii, and perhaps others), it cannot have been completed till after 165 B. C. E". (Encyc. Brit. III-853-4). Its present five-fold division, corresponding, to the five books of the Torah (Psalms i-xli; xlii-lxxii; lxxiii-lxxxix; xc-cvi; cii-cl) still shows distinct traces of the gradual editorial process to which it was subjected. The group of Psalms headed "David", the "Sons of Korah", "Asaph", "Hallel" and "Songs of Ascent", seem to indicate that the Psalter is the product of several editors as well as of many different authors.

The Psalms are the concrete monument of Israel's national consciousness. Unlike most poets, the Psalmists rarely disclose their own personalities. Like the Second Isaiah, they sing not of their own but of their people's passions, hope and love; and the beloved to whom they sing is none other than God. Where they speak in the first person, one is to understand either Israel or the pious within Israel. In their lyrical strains the soul of the nation is poured forth in communion with itself in prayer and in adoration of the Divine. Prof. T. K. Cheyne ascribes the fervor of Israel's religious poetry to the fact that "its writers spoke for the community, having absorbed that passionate love of God and country which glowed in each of its members. The Psalter (at any rate, books I-III) reminds one of that mystic eagle in Paradise, composed of interwoven, ruby-souls, glowing with the rays of the divine sun, whose beak Dante heard utter with its voice, both I and My when, in conception, it was We and Our. Never were there such prayers and praises as those of Israel, precisely because in the Psalmist as such the individual consciousness was all but lost in the corporate". (Origin of the Psalter, pp. 264-265).

The Psalmists, next to the Prophets, are Israel's noblest interpreters of God and of religious experience. In their sacred songs the ideals of Israel blossomed forth in all their wealth. They afford us a glimpse into the convictions and aspirations of the purest souls of the nation. Though they sing of a variety of subjects, "God is as it were the sun around which all revolves, and His light and heat illuminate and animate the whole" (A. F. Kirkpatrick, The Psalms, p. 10). Like the Prophets, they were not scientific theologians, writing systematic treatises on the Infinite and His relation to the Cosmos. They were religious poets who endeavored to communicate their own deep spiritual experiences to their fellowmen. To employ Hengstenberg's expression, they freshened up in them the blanched image of God. Their compositions help us to bring God out of the shadowy realm and to make Him the immovable Rock of Ages. Cheyne adds: "The freedom with which the Psalmists use anthropomorphic, or let us say at once, mythic expressions, is a consequence of the sense of religious security which animates them. They have no expectation of being taken literally" (Origin of the Psalter, pp. 185-6). The spiritual nature of God forms the central doctrine of their creed. He makes for life and order in the universe and for righteousness in the life of man.

HANUKAH, THE FEAST OF DEDICATION.

The midwinter festival of Judaism is Hanukah, the Feast of Dedication, which begins this year on Dec. 10 and lasts a week. It commemorates the victory of the Maccabees and their rededication of the Temple on Mt. Zion after it had been despoiled and defiled by the Syrian tyrant, Antiochus Epiphanes. These events of the second century before the Christian era, are told in the two books of the Maccabees, which give a detailed picture of the time. They narrate that Mattathias, the priest of Modin, refused to sacrifice to Jupiter, that he and his five sons took to the hills and conducted a guerilla warfare for years, fully conquered the enemy in a pitched battle, and thus won both political and religious freedom for their oppressed people. Judas Maccabee, the greatest military leader, died before the war was ended, but his example continued to give inspiration to the people and the struggle ended in the complete victory of the Jews. Hanukah is the only warlike festival of the Jewish people, but even in it the soldiers divide honors with the martyrs among whom we may mention Hannah, a heroic woman who with her seven sons died rather than desert the faith.

The festival has become symbolized by the progressive kindling of lights during the week of celebration. One candle the first evening, increasing each successive night to eight the last evening. It is the custom also to give gifts to the poor, and to exchange them with one another as tokens of good will.

RIGHTS RESTORED TO A RUSSIAN JEW.

On the petition of Senator Grusenberg full civil rights have been restored to M. Pinchus Dashevsky. These rights he lost consequent on the sentence of imprisonment passed on him for the attempt to assassinate the late M. Krushevan, of Kishineff, for having organized the great Jewish massacre in that city and for arranging other pogroms.

NEWS FROM LONDON

By Our Correspondent Dr. M. Epstein

London, Nov. 14, 1917.

The British government has officially expressed its sympathy with Jewish aspirations in Palestine. Mr. Balfour's letter to Lord Rothschild, dated Nov. 2, 1917, in which this information is conveyed, will undoubtedly rank as one of the most interesting documents in the checkered history of the Jewish people. Truly, wonders never cease! It was in the year 70 that the greatest empire of those days put an end to Jewish life in Palestine and scattered the inhabitants. After eighteen hundred and forty-seven years the greatest empire of these days is willing to re-establish Jewish life in Palestine, and it would seem that the victorious progress of British armies in the Holy Land will bring the realization of so many hopes nearer. Not only Jews are interested and glad; very many Christians, to whom the early history of the Hebrews is a subject of keen interest, share in the joy of the prospect. The subject in this country has had a good press. The leading journals warmly approve the scheme. The only dissenting voice is heard from within Anglo-Jewry itself.

Who are in the center of discontent? We have informed the readers of this page how an unnamed body has carried on a pamphleteering campaign against the Zionist aims and aspirations; how they have sent out ancient expressions of opinion, some deep, others shallow, broadcast in the land with the intention of influencing public feeling against the Zionists. We have called attention to the disgust of many people in Jewry at this undesirable method of controversy. A reply, written by Leon Simon, has just been published, and its simplicity of statement and clearness of treatment will be effective for all honest people. But the point to note is that circulation of the anti-Zionist shafts bore testimony to the existence of an anti-Zionist party. Even if its numbers are small, its influence would seem to be great. It is not an organized party; it has neither habitation nor name. But it exists—or a number of opponents exist. It is these people who rend the air with their lamentations because of Mr. Balfour's letter. Their representatives have rushed into the press to prove how evil a thing it would be for Jews to settle in Palestine; they have adduced a thousand reasons for opposing any such proposal, and it is rumored that they will organize a petition to the government to stay its hand in this matter.

The attitude of this angry band is difficult to comprehend. One need not be a professed Zionist to be glad that Palestine and the Jews should once more be brought into close contact. It is a phenomenon which cannot but touch the sentimental chord in any man who knows something of the trend of the world's history, in any Jew who has the smallest sympathy for his people's past. No philosophy of life is involved; no theory of history is questioned; no belief in the destinies of the Jews uprooted. Fr what, in effect, does Mr. Balfour's letter make possible? That whereas before a small number of Jews made desperate efforts to settle in Palestine, where, under Turkish rule, the political conditions were intolerable, now the prospect of good government is held out to these settlers and to others who may care to join them. The world will agree, we imagine, that Turkish rule is bad. It did not need the war to point out this weakness in the Turkish political system. It has cried out to the world for more than a generation. In making the statement, therefore, the motive is not one generated by war antagonism. It is a self-evident truth, vouched for by experience, known to all who are acquainted with political conditions in the Turkish dominions. The Jewish settlers did not desire to seize on the land; out of the love they had for it, they worked to open up and develop its possibilities, to the satisfaction of an admirable feeling in their own breasts, and to the advantage of the Turkish owners. In place of the bad government prevailing hitherto, the British government expresses its sympathy for good government in Palestine and the settlement of Jews under its sway. Though Great Britain is conquering Palestine from the Turks, whose claim to the country is one of conquest only, it signifies its approval of the restoration of the land to the people, who alone can be regarded as its rightful claimants. And are we to see in this any cause for regret or vexation? Look at it from the broad humanitarian point of view, from the point of view of President Wilson's plea for small peoples; look at it from the Jewish point of view; look at it from the British point of view—and can any sane observer see any cause for doubt and questioning?

Yet here in the midst of Anglo-Jewry we have a group of cavillers. Their fears are difficult to comprehend. Have they so little faith in the justice of the Allied cause that they fear their own rights as English citizens will be circumscribed? And suppose they are passionately attached to the belief that the spiritual mission of the Jews is to spread the knowledge of God in the world, and that in order to do so effectively the Jews must be scattered among the nations—how can the settlement of a comparatively small number of Jews in Palestine affect such a belief? There is the mustiness of mediaeval thought about this opposition. The cavillers forget that we are living in the twentieth century.

Outside the community a good deal of sympathy has been manifested for the Jewish resettlement of Palestine. The First Lodge of England, London, circularized a number of members of Parliament on the subject and received very encouraging replies. One and all, they welcomed the restoration of the Jews to Palestine. The London Lodge, though its members are composed of professed Zionists, non-Zionists and even anti-Zionists, has always agreed that it would be a sound thing to settle Jews in Palestine. When one hears from eye witnesses of what the colonists have achieved, it is heartening to think of possibilities in the future. And it is heartening, also, to learn that very many Jews are in the Palestine Expeditionary force, among them Capt. Norman Bentwich, a member of the London Lodge. Reports have come to hand of the Holy Day Services last Rosh Hashana and Yom Kippur conducted by Captain Bentwich on the edge of the desert, with the Holy Land in sight and the blue waters of the Mediterranean visible from the camp. It was a moving scene and a rare experience. Jewish soldiers at the gate of Palestine, praying in the ancient language of Palestine.! It was an occasion that must have suited Captain Bentwich admirably, and he improved it to the uttermost. Even the most careless was moved, and those who were privileged to participate in that unique ceremony will remember the experience throughout their lives. Perhaps the surest cure for the cavillers in our midst today would be to send them to Palestine for a short space of time.

One of the best features in the work of the lodge, both this year and last, has been the conferences arranged to be held after the formal business, in which problems of the day were discussed. The last occasion was devoted to an address by Mr. L. J. Greenberg, the editor of the "Jewish Chronicle", whose subject was the journalistic anti-Semitism which was manifesting itself in this country. There can be no gainsaying that the fair fame of England as the land of freedom, the land where the refugee always found a home, is being besmirched by a small coterie of writers brilliant with a superficial kind of flashy attraction. They are baiting the Jew. In particular, they complain that during air raids the Jew goes into the tubes to an extent beyond which he is entitled. It is an idle charge. What happened was that in September, when the enemy sent his aeroplanes to bomb such military establishments as hospitals, churches and workmen's dwelling-house flats, a section of the press, in its panic, declared that the one safe place in London were the stations of the Underground Railways. The result was that when the alarm was given, people—and the poorer and helpless sorts in particular—flocked to the tubes. Jews were there, too. That raised the ire of these same panic-mongering journals which had prescribed this very remedy. As though Jews were not citizens! As though Jews had no right to flee into safety, just like other people! The fact was that the tubes were packed, but it is certainly untrue to say that Jews were in any way predominant. No doubt their English accent was not of the purest, and the average man, unaccustomed to think, dubbed them foreigners. One did expect that that section of the English people which in the past spoke of foreigners with contempt would have woke up out of their stupor, considering that they are fighting the Germans side by side with nearly all the "foreigners" in the world—Frenchmen and Italians and Russians, Serbians and Montenegrins and the rest. One did expect that the outworn prejudices of this kind would have vanished away in an age in the world's history when the great politicians lay stress on the rights of small nationalities. But the rowdy journalists referred to above are of no real significance; with them it is a case of empty vessels making a great noise. The question is, should anything be done to stop the noise? Some would take no notice of it, holding that to ignore it is the only dignified course. Others, however, would take action to stop it. They feel, as Mr. Zangwill so admirably put it at the Brighton meeting to which we called attention in this column last month, that Jews have done their duty to the country—and more than sufficiently—and that they were therefore to have precisely the same liberty as non-Jews. In a word, the Jew was a citizen, like anyone else, bearing the citizen's burden, entitled to the citizen's privileges. If he chose to go into the tubes during an air raid, just as numbers and numbers of non-Jews did, he should do so. If he chose to remove his residence outside London, just as numbers and numbers of non-Jews did, he should do so. The Jew in the twentieth century must stand on his rights as a citizen, and if the flashy writers aforesaid attack those rights, there are ways and means of defense. On the whole, the discussion at the London Lodge inclined to the more positive policy of defense against unjust attacks. It is somewhat late in the day to stir up popular prejudices now. People in allied countries describe their cause as that of liberty and justice. The anti-Semetic clique of writers apparently merely mouth these words, recking of their meaning but little.

It is but just to add that the clique in question is of tiny dimensions, distinguished only by being able to include in their number one man who has won fame for saying brilliant things that are not true, and another who claims to be something of a military expert. The responsible press of this country has not lost its balance and is as fair to the Jew as he can wish. War is not good for nerves, and no doubt nerves are a bit on edge just now all over Europe. But the war will end one day, and commonsense, like justice, will triumph in the end. There is therefore no occasion for taking these attacks tragically. But it is well to be alive to their existence and to be ready, should occasion arise, to deal with them as public nuisances.

The Arthur Davis Memorial Lecture, an account of which was given in this column some time back, has now been established, and the Jewish Historical Society of England is acting as a kind of sponsor to the scheme. The purpose of the lecture is "to foster Hebraic thought and learning", and the first lecturer of the foundation will be Mr. Israel Zangwill, whose subject will be "Chosen Peoples—the Hebrew versus the Teutonic Ideal".

The Anglo-Jewish Association has published its annual report for this year, and, as usual, the position of the Jews in various countries is surveyed with an insight and a knowledge that is rare in similar documents. This year, however, little can be said that is new; the outline is only too well known. Perhaps the blackest spot in the picture is still Roumania. The general conditions in that country must be awful in the extreme, but Jews are apparently suffering more than others. When the great conference settles the affairs of the world after the war, the position of the Jews in Roumania will need to receive careful attention. For the moment little can be done, and the report makes that clear. Of more immediate interest are the educational statistics furnished by the report. The number of children that are being educated in schools, either wholly or in part subsidized by the Anglo-Jewish Association, was as follows: Boys, 3,134; girls, 3,050; infants, 943. A considerable portion of the association's subventions is made for the teaching of English in schools in the East.

TWO JEWS IN PREMIER CLEMENCEAU'S CABINET.

Paris.—Amongst the ministers named by Premier Clemenceau in his new cabinet, there are two Jews, Louis Klotz, Minister of Finance, and Henry Simon, Minister of Colonies. Premier Clemenceau is well remembered by Jews throughout the world on account of the fight he made on behalf of Captain Dreyfuss.

ADDRESS BY MR. ISADORE SHAPIRO ON THE OCCASION OF THE ENTRAINMENT OF SOLDIERS FROM THE BIRMINGHAM (ALA.) DISTRICT

We stand in the presence of an [illegible]ing occasion. Again we are impressed with the gravity of the world strife. But the horror of it all is subdued by the consciousness that America is right.

We do homage to ourselves when we honor these men who soon commence their march toward the goal of international brotherhood.

You men are pilgrims of liberty. You journey to foreign soil as the protagonists of human rights. You step forward to liberate the world. You go as our representatives to fight for the things that are precious, for democracy, for the rights of nations, big and small, for the privilege of governments to live their lives unmolested and undisturbed, for the unclinching of the mailed fist, for the destruction of sword rule, for the free exercise of the right of travel, for the freedom of all mankind.

Your mission is sacred, and the manner of its performance profoundly significant. Your task is great, but no greater than its worthwhileness.

It chills your hearts, we know, to discard the customary affairs of life and to close the door upon things held dear.

The last glance, the final embrace, the parting kiss, the godspeed, the vanishing wave, the flitting gleam of things familiar—we know how hard it is to withstand them all.

But isn't it glorious, men, to embark upon a crusade for the preservation of all this? Isn't it soul-stirring to become an artery in the war against war? Isn't it exhilarating to know you are doing something for a country that has done so much for you?

You go to make home more secure, to make honor more honorable, to make firmer our national existence. Home would be stifled, country would be shamed, love would be afraid, if we yielded to autocratic domination.

Go forth into the land of the enemy and conquer—conquer for civilization. Officer or private, the integrity of our country and the sanctity of our homes are in your keeping.

May you never know cowardice. May you be strong in courage and warm in heart.

You leave with our faith that you be brave, our hopes that you be safe, and our prayers that you return to us sound in body, glorified in triumph, and added honors to the red and the white and the blue.

To the kindred of these men who go to democratize the world, we tender our sympathy and thanks. Sympathy for the absence of their own, and thanks for the heroic offering. It should be fine solace to them to know that they are contributing to the liberation of the world and the betterment of the human race. God sustain them in their noble sacrifice.

And we men and women who remain at home—we are not absolved from duty. Rising to sing the "Star Spangled Banner" does not terminate our obligation to country. Saluting the flag does not pay our debt. Participation in these ceremonies does not end our gratitude. These soldiers who go from the womb of Jefferson County must always be uppermost in our minds. We must minister to their wants and provide for their comfort. And their dependents must become our dependents.

It devolves upon every one to render to the country the maximum service. Our patriotic utterances must be translated into patriotic actions. The test is being applied to every citizen to ascertain whether his citizenship is genuine or false; whether it is a citizenship that is really American.

If American independence was worth gaining in 1776, isn't it worth saving in 1917? And the person who impedes the progress of this saving is untrue to himself, false to his neighbor, disloyal to the Stars and Stripes; he lies to his American citizenship.

It is a colossal undertaking to overwhelm German brutality abroad. Traitors upon American soil are not worthy of American bullets.

Let us manifest our love for free institutions by dedicating our lives and our all to their defense and protection. Americanism is more than a word; it is a creed—a living creed; a creed of service—of service to man and service to country. Who can hear the strains of "My Country, 'Tis of Thee", who can gaze upon yonder flag, who can behold these liberty-fighting men, and not pulsate with this creed? Yea, the symphony of America is a symphony of service. Let us attune our souls to this music of service. Let us feel it. Let us vibrate with it. Let us live it.

THE BRITISH ANNOUNCEMENT.

A declaration by a responsible minister of the British Crown, especially if he be the minister of foreign affairs, will always command the world's attention. British foreign policy is free from sentimentalism. It is cool, calculating and thought out with care. It is not inspired by the moment's exigencies, though a certain constellation of events may call for an expression at a given hour. England has behind her an experience, stretching over centuries, in dealing with colonials. If she imposes her will upon them, that will is not of the ruthless kind which annihilates national expression. Imperial she is, but in the empire there is room for all sorts of national cultures. Her business is to make subject nations content, and it is her experience that a nation will be content so long as it is left to develop its own internal affairs after its own pattern. England is a firm believer in unity amidst variety. Certainly she serves her own interests. But she lives and lets others live. The narrow strip of land which opens upon the Mediterranean is the natural road between the Nile delta and the Tigris-Euphrates valley. Egypt is under British sway, and Mesopotamia is reserved by England for herself. It is quite natural that the linkland should be hers likewise. The Arabian oasis, known as Hejaz, has been made into an independent kingdom under English suzerainty. Palestine, the barrier against the desert, is, according to report, to be turned over to the Jews. It is to be opened to Jewish colonization. And the colonies are promised home rule, provided the rights of others are safeguarded. The Zionist dream seems to have become a reality. A great nation, according to published report, has given its adhesion to the aims of the Zionist movement. That must give satisfaction to and gain support from even such Jews as have hitherto been indifferent or opposed to Zionism. It is not necessary at all that the support shall take on the character of complete acquiescence in all the details of the Zionist program. We may still go apart in many ways, and most of us may choose to remain on the outside. But none of us will remain indifferent to the realization of a dream which, we may truly say, has been the obsession of the Jewish mind for centuries. Prior to the British declaration, anti-Zionists have pointed out the impracticability of the scheme. But now it seems to be much more than a scheme. Facts must be reckoned with. Our theories must be adjusted to the facts, not the reverse.

Assuming that England's minister for foreign affairs is correctly quoted, then it must be taken for granted that England has spoken after consultation with the allies—that the restoration of Jewish nationality in Palestine is one of the objects of the Entente, and will be a subject for discussion at the peace congress. It is quite possible that the other side will just as warmly support it. A Jewish homeland in Palestine to be stable requires the consent of all nations. That is the meaning of the Basle platform. A Jewish Palestine would in no wise be prejudiced either to the interests of non-Jews in Palestine or of Jews outside Palestine. There are Englishmen outside England and Germans beyond the confines of the German Empire. The bulk of Jewry will remain where they are now, loyal citizens, participating in the culture of their environment. They will be known as Jews on the religious side. But there will also be Palestinian Jews, even as there are now. What harm to anyone if these Palestinians manage their own affairs in their own way on their own soil? In the days of Philo the Jews owned many fatherlands, but one motherland. Why not the same now? Many fatherlands, one motherland. There is only one event in our long history to which the British announcement may be compared, and that is the edict of Cyrus. Only the fewest availed themselves of the permission to return. The dispersion became even larger. There were millions abroad against the one million in the mother country. The mistakes of the past must not be repeated. The English overlord, or whoever he may be, will neither repeat the mistakes of cruel Rome. Jews are bound to emigrate. All people do. Why not create an outlet in Palestine? And if Palestine, why should not that land be so governed as to afford such Jews as are not happy elsewhere a place where they may feel at home and at their best? If the majority abid where they are now, that means that they are happy where they are, and no one shall disturb them in their happiness; no one, indeed, can. But those who may be happiest in Palestine belong there. And to that country they will gravitate. The sooner we let that fact be borne in upon us the sooner there will be peace to Israel and in Israel. Let us decide to help those who will go there. We must not hinder them. If the restoration becomes an acknowledged fact, it will soon earn the goodwill of all right-thinking humanity.

THE COURSE OF REVOLUTION.

The course of revolution, like that of love, never did run smooth. One should wish that over night, as it were, a long-established state of public affairs might be altered, root and branch, and that in that very moment the stability which attached to the former regime might be conveyed to the new order of things. But revolutions are not made of such stuff. Once you break down a system, it takes time to build up a new one. Time is the builder. There is no short-cut across it for the most masterful architect. Certain people are fitted by nature to overthrow, but the same people are not usually adepts in constructive work. It is all a matter of temperament. The essential ingredient of a successful coup d' etat is suddenness. A jerky, nervous leader, and the mob does the rest. But constructive work requires slow progress and a steady purpose. Revolutions are made by extremists, but a stable administration requires steering a middle course and the capacity for reconciling all. We know the story of the French revolution. If precedents teach any lesson, we ought to expect that the Russian debacle will likewise terminate in a dictatorship. It is idle to prophesy, but it is wise to mark time. Things in Russia are in an ominous muddle. We are willing to believe that the Russians are tired of the war. We are willing to concede that the idealists now at the rudder are honestly opposed to the unnecessary carnage. We all long for peace. Naturally, it must be a peace well worth our sacrifices and of a durable kind. We do not want to go through the same experiences again. All nations are pretty well exhausted, certainly the European nations. And there is no blinking the fact that the morale of the Russian army is broken, that the fighting spirit is out of them. The allies are naturally aware of it and are counting the consequences. A restatement, that is, a revision of their objects and demands, is already taking place. We are free to say that any honorable means of terminating the war must be tried. Meanwhile we must be prepared for all sorts of developments in Russia. There will be a counter-revolution. The heart of Israel trembles. Let us hope that the newly-won liberty will not be short lived. The Jew is always the scapegoat, especially for the reactionaries. The Jew Bronstein, alias Trotzki, the Jew Nahamkes, alias Stokloff—thus talk the reporters of the Associated Press. We should not want the Jews out of the movement. They belong there, if their convictions carry them thither. There are more Jews among the moderates. The bulk of Russian Jewry are just as much concerned for the welfare of their fatherland as anybody else. But there are always sinister minds, even abroad, who will pounce upon the Jew wherever their own schemes are thwarted. No one may tell what the future Russia will look like, how far its borders will reach, whether it will be imperial or confederate, whether it will be reactionary or liberal. But somehow we feel as if the older order of things is buried and done away with for good. There cannot be a return to Czarism, with its ugly cynicism. There cannot be a repristination of the Pale of Settlement. It is to the interest of Russia to release the pent-up energies of a loyal portion of its citizens, that they may be used in developing the country and in raising the standard of its civilization. The extremists may at present be somewhat impatient of what to them seem like backward democracies elsewhere. They will learn that their dreams are not realizable, and the wise will turn to a course of action which will place Russia on a level with other tried experiments in democratic government. They are at present hugging the unattainable. Their sneer at moderation will pass away. For only along the lines of moderation will success be achieved. And no lover of mankind can but wish success to the course of the Russian revolution.

SOLDIER WORK IN CAMPS AND OUTSIDE OF CAMPS.

Much confusion has been created by the fact that ignorance on the one hand and enthusiasm on the other are misleading people with regard to the real effectiveness of soldier service work. Many have almost wholly lost sight of the work that ought to be done and must be done outside of the camp. We forget that while there are within the camp several recognized religious agencies, the War Department now has a Commission for Training Camp Activities to deal solely with work outside of the camp. The Government has found it necessary to send representatives to every city in or near which a cantonment is located to assist the organizations which are attempting to maintain the efficiency and the morale of the soldier while outside of the camp. Within the camp the efficiency of the soldier is kept up by the military duties and discipline. It is only when the soldier is on leave of absence or on a furlough that there is danger of impairing his efficiency by such forces as exist in towns near which camps are located. Questionable drinking houses, resorts of ill repute, amusement places of bad character are the places that are the greatest foes to the efficiency of the American soldier. The President created a Commission for Training Camp Activities in this country to combat the evil influences of those places, and to afford proper recreational facilities for our men when on leave.

This Commission has become one of the most important of the war organizations, simply because it is now a recognized fact that soldiers must be taken care of outside of the camp as well as inside of the camp, because the men in uniform need and must have the proper kind of amusement and because no human being can stand work day after day without some kind of recreational relief.

The B'nai B'rith has never intended to emphasize its work inside of the camp. From the very outset, those who planned the work of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League of the I. O. B. B. felt that within the camp all are American soldiers and that there should be no social distinction. Religious services should be conducted by Rabbis. But those who outlined the work of the B'nai B'rith understood and appreciated the necessity of maintaining headquarters for Jewish boys outside of the camp. The social consciousness of the Jew appears more strongly outside of the camp than inside of it. Within the camp he is an American soldier in a company of other men, and he does not want to be segregated. Outside of the camp he again becomes conscious of his former social relations with those about him. It is just here where the clubroom headquarters and recreation rooms fill the greatest needs of the soldiers and off the recreational facilities that keep up his efficiency and maintain his morale. It is at these recreation rooms that our Jewish boys meet their relatives and friends, indulge themselves in those social amusements to which they have been accustomed, meet fellow-Jews, and feel again that they are not only American soldiers in uniform, but that they are Jews as well. This activity has been given definite recognition and commendation by the head of the Commission for Training Camp Activities, Hon. Raymond B. Fosdick, who, in writing to Mr. Adolf Kraus, states among other things, "Your activity at Rockford, which has already been brought to our attention, and which you mention in your letter, is a very creditable piece of work, and we sincerely hope you will continue it and extend it". This work ought not to be confused with the work of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work in the Army and Navy, which carries on its activities mainly inside of the camp. There is a definite distinction between the work inside of our military camps and the work outside of the camps, just as there is a distinction between the Y. M. C. A. within the camp, and the general work of the Commission for Training Camp Activities outside of the camp.

The hundreds of men that have been entertained at our headquarters and especially on Saturdays and Sundays, testify to the great popularity of these centers. Many letters have been received which speak very eloquently of the service and the necessity of these clubrooms. The work of the B'nai B'rith outside of the camp has been thoroughly established and officially approved by the War Department.

A number of statements have been widely circulated regarding the disagreement between the Jewish Welfare Board and the B'nai B'rith. One of these statements reports that it was the conference at Washington which caused the break. As a matter of fact, nothing happened at Washington to cause any friction between the Jewish Welfare Board and the B'nai B'rith. The cause of the disagreement lay with the Welfare Board which insisted that the American Soldiers and Sailors' Welfare League of the B'nai B'rith had to merge its existence with that of the Welfare Board, which was contrary to the original agreement, namely, that it was to merge its activities only.

DR. WOLFENSTEIN CELEBRATES SEVENTY-SIXTH BIRTHDAY.

On Monday, Dec. 10, Dr. Samuel Wolfenstein celebrated his seventy-sixth birthday. For more than thirty-five years Dr. Wolfenstein devoted his life to the care of the orphans and his reward for such loyal and unselfish devotion to them is their great veneration and love for him.

A great number of the orpham asylum alumni gathered at the home of Dr. Wolfenstein in honor of his birthday anniversary and to observe the opening of the Chanukah festival.

Dr. Wolfenstein is active in many philanthropic endeavors. Although exceedingly busy, he always found the necessary time to render any service demanded of him in behalf of humanity.

The B'nai B'rith News wishes him a long life of health and happiness.

DEATH OF DR. ADOLPH KOHUT.

The death is reported from Berlin of Dr. Adolph Kohut, brother of the late Dr. Alexander Kohut. The deceased was born in Hungary in 1848, but lived the greater part of his life in Germany. For a time he was editor of the Berliner Zeitung, and because of his antagonism to Bismarck he was exiled from Prussia and lived for a time in obscurity in Dresden. He was a most prolific writer, especially on subjects pertaining to the history of music. His best known and most popular work is his "Beruhmte Israelitische Manner and Frauen", in two volumes, which appeared in Leipzig in 1900. There he gathered the biographies and photographs of a large number of famous Jews and he drew upon sources which have hitherto been unknown. His wife was a noted singer and was for some time "Hofopernsinger" in Dresden.

TWO ROTHSCHILDS FALL ON THE PALESTINE FRONT.

Two members of the famous Rothschild family have met their death in the British military operations on the Palestine front. They are Captain Neal Primrose, son of Lord Roseberry, and his cousin, Evelyn de Rothschild, son of the late Leopold Rothschild. When they volunteered, both of them had expressed the wish to be assigned to the operations designed to free Palestine from Turkey and to make possible the founding in the Holy Land of a national home for the Jewish people.

"The Maccabaean", the official Zionist magazine, in commenting on the death of these two heroes, says:

"Notwithstanding that his mother had married out of the faith when she became the wife of the Scottish Earl who became the Prime Minister of England, Captain Neal Primrose was always intensely Jewish. As a young man he expressed himself earnestly in favor of Jewish nationalism, and his views on the subject resulted in his being made the hero of Winnifred Graham's novel, 'The Zionists'. As a member of Parliament he identified himself conspicuously with Jewish affairs, speaking of himself always as one of the Jewish people. In this attitude he followed in the footsteps of his mother, who throughout her life remained an intense Jewess, attending services regularly and associating herself in every possible manner with Jewish interests.

"When the British war office was recently considering plans for a Jewish regiment, specifically for service in the Holy Land, under the command of Col. Patterson of the redoubtable 'Zion Mule Corps' which distinguished itself during the ill-fated Gallipoli campaign—Capt. Neal Primrose was among the very first to apply for a transfer to that regiment. When the plan for a Jewish regiment was postponed he joined General Allenby's forces.

"In this he was emulated by his cousin, Evelyn, who before sailing for Palestine remarked to a friend that he was deeply stirred by the thought that he was to be permitted to march with the British forces into Jerusalem, and spoke at length of his great hope that this event would enable the Holy City to renew its ancient glory as the capital of Judea".

POLISH JEWS DENIED RIGHTS.

An Associated Press Dispatch from The Hague reports grave complaints from the Jews in the Polish territory occupied by the Austrians. The use of Yiddish is forbidden and none of the regulations made by the Germans concerning the status of those in the German occupied territory is operative in the Austrian section. The Austrians' excuse is that the old Russian discriminatory laws governing the Jews in Poland cannot be abolished.

THE B'NAI B'RITH AND PALESTINE.

Letters From Public Men.

The London Lodge of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith recently drew up a leaflet on the "Jews and Palestine", which is forwarded to a number of public men in this country. Several replies have been received, and extracts from them appear below:

Capt. W. Ormshy-Gore, M. P.:

I have long been a keen supporter of the Zionist cause and am in full sympathy with Jewish national aspirations, and I look forward with confidence to the realization of the Palestinian ideal. I have good friends among the Arabs, as well as amongst Palestinian Jews, and I trust that the mutual understanding which should exist between the two great branches of the Semitic family will be fruitful not only in the future history of both nations, but in creating once more the source of so much culture and inspiration, which in the past has made mankind the debtors to Arab and to Jew.

The Rt. Hon. Charles Hobhouse, M. P.:

The movement which is in existence for the return of the Jews to Palestine has my complete sympathy. If they are to be—as I hope they may be—restored to a sense of settled nationality, then the only means by which that nationality can be asserted and assured is by the return to the land from which that nation sprang.

Capt. L. S. Amery, M. P.:

I am in entire sympathy with the proposal for re-establishing a national and spiritual home for the Jewish people in Palestine.

Mr. John P. Boland, M. P., J. P.:

I sympathize very much with the aspirations of the Jewish people to return to their own land. As an Irish Nationalist I fully understand their longing to see the full development of their nationality.

Sir J. T. Agg-Gardner, M. P.:

I view the aspiration of promoting an autonomous Jewish community with sympathy and with every wish for its success.

Lord Claud Hamilton's Secretary:

His lordship fully sympathizes with the wishes of the members of your lodge to be re-established in Palestine, but he does not believe that any state aid from this or from other countries will be forthcoming in support of such a movement, until it is clearly established that all Jews, both rich and poor, are practically unanimous in their desire to return to the Holy Land.

Mr. Thomas Richards, M. P., Secretary South Wales Miners' Federation:

I have always taken a very kindly interest in the Jewish community, and shall be very glad to render any assistance in reestablishing the Jewish people in their ancient national home.

Major Rowland Hunt, M. P.:

I should think it would be an excellent thing if the Jewish people could be re-established in Palestine.

Sir John Jardine, Bart, M. P.:

I write to express my sympathy with the endeavors of the Jewish race to re-establish itself in Palestine in such a way that Jews may live and thrive under their own institutions.

Mr. William Field, M. P.:

I have supported this movement by attending and writing to meetings and will continue to do anything I can to forward the legitimate aspirations of the Jews.

Mr. J. Annan Bryce, M. P.:

The world ought to rejoice that the race to which it owes the idea of a spiritual life should at last, have a footing on a land which it can call its own.

Major Davies, M. P.:

I am deeply interested in the movement which you are conducting and hope that it will soon reach a successful result.

Mr. Ronald McNeill, M. P.:

The Zionist idea is one that enlists my warmest sympathy, and I ardently hope the settlement which the war will produce may be the means of re-establishing a Jewish state in the historical home of that race in the Holy Land.

Sir John Scurrah Randles, M. P. (N. W. Manchester):

I shall be pleased to forward in any way within my power the wishes of the large number of my constituents who are Jews.

Sir George A. Touche, M. P.:

One result of the war has been to accentuate national feeling, a feeling always strong among the British peoples. Perhaps this was the cause of the sympathy extended to the Jews by the British in the past, and it will, I am sure, create a spirit of willingness to help when the time comes for the Jewish race to form a national center in Palestine.

Mr. J. G. Butcher, K. C., M. P.:

I am in entire sympathy with the aspirations of the Jewish race for a resettlement of their people in the ancient home of their fathers, and feel assured that the establishment of an industrious, peace-loving people in Palestine, free from all external oppression, would form a guarantee for good government and security in that portion of the Eastern shores of the Mediterranean.

Mr. M. L. Hearn, M. P.:

If out of this world upheaval should come a restoration of Palestine to your race, and a re-establishment of a Jewish state, I, for one, should rejoice. Such a state could appeal as nothing else could for tolerance and justice to the conscience of a world which I hope to see restored to sanity and civilization under a League of Nations which shall make peace secure and oppression a memory.

Mr. T. Owen Jacobsen, M. P.:

I entirely sympathize with the movement to re-establish the Jewish people in their ancient national home. I have always hoped that the Jews would return one day in triumph to Palestine, and I fervently hope that day may now be not far distant.

Mr. H. L. Hearn, M. P.:

In the struggle for the re-establishment of your race in their ancient national home the Jewish people have my full sympathy and good wishes.—London Jewish Chronicle.

LEAGUE OF BRITISH JEWS.

A new organization was formed in London under the name of "The League of British Jews". Among the founders are: Dr. Israel Abrahams, D. L. Alexander, A. F. Franklin, Prof. Israel Gollanz, Sir Charles S. Henry, Sir Philip Magnus, Major Laurie Magnus, Hon. Lily H. Montagu, G. C. Montefiore, Sir Matthew Nathan, Major Lionel de Rothschild, Sir Isidore Spielman, Sir Edward D. Stern, Lord Swaythling, Lucien Wolf and others. The officers are: Major Lionel de Rothschild, president; Lord Swaythling and Sir Philip Magnus, vice-presidents; Sir Charles S. Henry, treasurer; A. Abrahams, secretary.

The objects of the league are: (1) To uphold the status of British subjects professing the Jewish religion. (2) To resist the allegation that Jews constitute a separate political nationality. (3) To facilitate the settlement in Palestine of such Jews as may desire to make Palestine their home.

The reasons for the formation of the league are given in a public announcement: "Attacks upon British Jews of this country have taken various forms; their fitness to be loyal subjects of the crown has been questioned; they have been declared to have a 'dual nationality'; they have been accused of promoting international objects for political purposes. The League of British Jews is formed to protect as occasion may arise the rights and political status of British subjects professing the Jewish religion. Membership is open to all at a minimum subscription of one shilling per annum".

SOME INTERESTING ARMY STATISTICS.

In the course of an address before Sinai Society, Baltimore, B. H. Hartogenesis furnished some interesting statistics. He said that in January of 1916 the total number of enlisted men in the regular army, as given by the government, was 64,144. Of this number 3,741 were Jews, and 844 Jews were in the United States navy, a total of 4,588, making a ratio of over 7 per cent. In the army today the number of Jews is estimated to be nearer 60,000 than 50,000. Prayer books and Bibles are being prepared for the larger number. Twenty-five Jewish physicians and surgeons of Baltimore have abandoned their practices to serve their country. The large number of enlistments of Jews before the draft was instituted gives them more than their proportionate representation in the army. The percentage of Jews to the general population in the United States is less than 3 per cent. Their proportion in the army is not less than 7 per cent; by some it is estimated as high as 12 per cent.

JEWISH JUDGES APPOINTED IN POLAND.

Twelve Jews were appointed as judges in various courts in the occupied provinces of Poland. Among them were also two, Poznanski and Rundstein, who were appointed to a higher court. These judges were appointed to the courts of Warsaw, Lodz, Radom, Lublin and Petrikov. A large number of Jews were also appointed as secretaries of courts and other judicial officers. All the Jews thus appointed belong to the so-called assimilation class. The Jewish nationalists protested to the German authorities in Warsaw against this discrimination against the Zionists and nationalists.

PRESIDENT WILSON RECEIV[illegible] COMMITTEE OF PROMIN[illegible] JEWS.

On Thursday, Nov. 22, 1917, [illegible] Wilson assured a committee [illegible] nent Jews who called upon him [illegible] would do his utmost to aid the[illegible] ward relief to the Jews of Pol[illegible] Henry Morgenthau, who headed the committee, presented the plea. This committee was formed several weeks ago to wait on the President and urge upon him the necessity of making some arrangements through diplomatic channel so as to make it possible to forward relief to the Jewish and non Jewish population in Poland, now under German control. The committee left the White House after a half hour conference satisfied that the President would do his utmost in granting its request.

HADASSAH'S PHYSICIANS IN JERUSALEM.

The work of heroes can be read between the lines of the plain business statement of the physicians in Jerusalem, Dr. Albert Ticho and Dr. Bertha Kagan, the Jerusalem physicians in the service of Hadassah, the women's Zionist organization. War conditions have increased the burdens, so the additional medical unit organized by Hadassah is as yet unable to proceed. As a result, the medical aid being rendered in Palestine is altogether inadequate, and the pathetically small staff of doctors, midwives and nurses are bravely sruggling with a task beyond its powers.

Trachoma and other eye diseases hitherto all too prevalent in Palestine, have been treated with marked success. Treatment has been given daily in twenty-one schools, drugs and appliances being provided free. In the first year the ravages of the disease were reduced by one-half. But the large number of new pupils admitted to the schools brings a continuous influx of infected children.

Owing to the departure of two nurses, Hadassah was obliged to reduce its maternity work to twenty-five cases per month. The difficulties have been increased by the weakened condition of the patients induced by "prolonged underfeeding". Funds are low, but the midwives bravely continue their tasks while themselves on the verge of starvation. In the first six months of 1917 a total of 571 cases received examination, advice or assistance.

A polyclinic for women's and children's diseases was founded, drugs being distributed free of charge. In the field of work the demands made upon the workers in the field are enormous. Dr. Kagen and Dr. Thon paid a considerable part of the expense out of their own pockets. So great is the distress that the institute is besieged by applicants, and the report complains that the premises are much too small, the waiting-room being unable to accommodate more than "twenty patients at a time". The need of home visits to patients increased together with all other demands. But so great was the dearth of physicians that for a time this important work was discontinued. The doctor in charge resumed the visits and supplied medicines, "without the sanction of Hadassah," sarrying out the relief "on a very small scale", only 506 visits being made to the homes of the sick in three months. These modest words tell their own story of devotion to a cause.

There has now been organized a method of temporary medical service which has done much to alleviate the sufferings of the sick, and to prevent the spread of infection. The Straus Health Bureau occupies itself with theoretical questions, while Hadassah is responsible for the practical work of caring for the patients. Three dispensaries have been founded, two of which are free. Moreover, in four months, 1,395 visits were made by eleven physicians, in addition to over 1,500 other cases of medical help, and the distribution of large quantities of drugs and milk.

Welfare work for the Jewish soldiers in our armies, by the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith is not, by any means, for purpose of conversion. Conversion is not their "metier". But, whether we do or do not say it, our crazy radicals will have to admit our religious neutrality.—The Jewish Voice.

DUTCH PREMIER ON JEWISH QUESTION.

The Jewish publicist, "Ben Mose Zwi", has had an interview with M. Cort van der Linden, Dutch Prime Minister and Minister of the Interior. His excellency expressed his deepest sympathy with the Jews on account of the great sufferings they had experienced through the war. He added his belief that in all probability the Jewish question would be brought on the tapis at the Peace Congress. The minister also discussed the possibility of a large number of Jews coming, after the war, to Holland, where their people enjoyed fullest, unrestricted equality of rights.

I hope I shall always possess firmness and virtue enough to maintain, what I consider the most enviable of all titles, the character of an "honest man". —George Washington.

SAMUEL MASON SPECIAL REPRESENTATIVE OF HEBREW SHELTERING AND IMMIGRANT AID SOCIETY OF AMERICA LEAVES FOR JAPAN.

Mr. Samuel Mason, the special representative of the Hebrew Sheltering and Immigrant Aid Society of America to investigate conditions among the Jewish emigrants stranded in Japan started on his voyage. He will leave from a Pacific port but before doing so will visit the Seattle and San Francisco branches of the Society.

Mr. Mason carries with him letters of credence from the State Department, United States Labor Department, and from the Japanese and the Russian Embassies.

Mr. Mason's principal mission is to extend prompt relief to the emigrants now stranded between Harbin, Manchuria and Yokohama, Japan.

Considering the present world conditions and the best interests of our own country these unfortunates will be aided and advised according to their physical, mental and moral state. Such as are inadmissible under our immigration laws will, if possible, be assisted to return to their native countries, while proper connection will be made for the others with their relatives and friends in the United States.

The Society decided upon sending a special representative to Japan in response to urgent demands for help which had come from Yokohama. There are at least 3,000 stranded Jewish emigrants between that city and Harbin, Manchuria, and most of them are women and children eager to join the heads of their families already settled in the United States. It is estimated that several thousand more are stranded at different points in Siberia. A few weeks ago the Society cabled, through Mr. Jacob H. Schiff, $3,000 to Mr. B. W. Fleisher, publisher of the Japan Advertiser to meet the immediate needs of those refugees who, according to the report of the Department of State were in danger of being exploited. A temporary home has been opened for them in Yokohama and Mr. Mason is empowered to take such further steps as will assure their safety.

RESOLUTION.

At a meeting of the Executive Committee of the Alumni Association of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, held on Monday, Nov. 19, 1917, in the City of New York, the following resolution was adopted:

Whereas, the following official statement has been issued by the British Government:

"His Majesty's government views with favor the establishment of a national home for the Jewish people and will use its best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country".

Now, therefore,

Be it Resolved, That we, the Executive Committee of the Alumni Association of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, express our gratitude and great joy at the official recognition, by the great liberal English people through their government, of Palestine as the national homeland of the Jewish people. We rejoice in the assurance of their assistance in bringing about the realization of the aspirations of our people for the restoration to them of their ancient soil. We hail this official statement as the beginning of the actual consummation of Israel's yearnings for Zion.

VENIZELOS REASSURES JEWISH LEADERS.

Lord Rothschild and Sir Stuart Samuel had a conference with the Greek premier, Venizelos, while the latter was on a visit to London, regarding the fate of the Jews in Salonica. The impression was recently created in London and elsewhere that the Greek government wished to rid Salonica of Jewish influence and that it was for this reason that the bill was introduced in parliament to confiscate the vacant lots belonging to Jews who suffered in the recent fire there. Venizelos explained to the delegation that the intention was to construct a more beautiful city, and that the owners of the lots will be fully compensated for the property which will be taken from them. M. Venizelos also assuerd the delegation that the Greek government, as well as the people, are very favorably disposed towards the Jews and that there is no desire on the part of anyone that the Jews should leave Salonica.

FOOD CONSERVATIONISMS.

"If we discontinue exports we will move the German line from France to the Atlantic seaboard". That is the sententious way in which Food Administrator puts the situation. Tons of statistics and argument could add nothing to it.

In order to protect the Nation's food supply from insect ravages the President has placed the arsenic industry of the country under direction of the Food Administration. A threatened shortage in the supply of arsenical insecticides caused this action. The potato bug, grasshopper, and crop-destroying worm must be looked after.

Do not be worried by any scare rumors about shortage of one thing after another. There are unscrupulous persons abroad trying to produce runs on the retail stores by starting some unfounded report. One day it will be matches, another laundry blue, another salt, and so on. Set all these down as either malicious or designing. Live and buy and do as usual. When a real shortage in any staple article is likely to occur the Food Administration will give ample warning.

The war-emergency food inventory taken by the Department of Agriculture yielded some amusing results. Wrestling with the English language, a Syrian dealer in fruits and vegetables listed all his stock of vegetables as "vegetable fats". One woman was informed by a mischief-maker that the Government intended to take all of her canned preserves in excess of a hundred jars. She promptly dug a large trench and buried all the rest where she was sure it would not be discovered.

Over in Europe there are millions of men fighting our battles, and tens of millions of men and women back in the factories supplying the fighters with munitions and war supplies. The efficiency of all these fighters and workers can be measured and actually put upon a pair of scales and weighed. If we send them only as much wheat as we could spare from this year's crop after using wheat we have been accustomed to there would not be enough to nourish them. If we can by substitution save and send them only a small portion of what we normally consume they will be properly nourished. We can do it without harm to our stomachs and with great good to our consciences. Try it.

How long will the homes of our country allow it to be said that the hotels and restaurants are doing far more in proportion than they in saving the foods which we must ship to our allies if we are to win the war? This is a serious reflection upon the patriotism of our good people, and we do not believe they will willingly rest under it.

New York City is fast rivaling its former reputation for extravagance by a new one for food conservation, particularly in its magnificent hotels and eating places. The figures received by the Food Administration show immense savings in meat and wheat through the rigid observance of meatless Tuesday and wheatless Wednesday and other conservation measures. For instance, in the hotels and restaurants of New York on Tuesday, Nov. 13, the saving in meats amounted to 193,545 pounds, or 96.75 tons. The saving of wheat flour on Wednesday, Nov. 14, was 101,295 pounds, or 50.6 tons, or 517 barrels. And it must be remembered that this movement is only fairly under way.

What is the basis for comparison of saving in homes and in public eating places? Wholesale and retail dealers. For instance, one firm selling in several States to a great variety of trade reports the following decrease in Tuesday orders since the adoption of meatless days: In hotels, 30 per cent; in restaurants, hospitals, and institutions, 25 per cent; in schools, 25 per cent; to retail trade and homes, 12½ per cent. This puts duty up to the homes. Speed up that per cent.

Notice has been served upon Michigan coal operators that if they refuse to ship in accordance with prices fixed by the State fuel administrator under authority of the United States Fuel Administration the Government will take possession of the mines and operate them.

The Lever law, under which the Fuel Administrator acts, is sufficiently deterrent for most people. In calling the attention of coke producers who had been reported as infringing the law, Dr. Garfield pointed out the penalty, "that any person guilty of asking, demanding, or receiving higher prices than are allowed under the fuel-price regulations shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $5,000 or be imprisoned not more than two years or both". This might be considered a gentle reminder.

Substitution, Substitution, SUBSTITUTION, SUBSTITUTION. Commit the word to memory as the biggest word in food conservation.

Thoughts and Tidings—Review of Passing Events

By H. Eliassof

Simeon Samuel Frug, the Great Russo-Jewish Poet

In the beginning of last month a year ad passed since the death of this wonderful Jewish singer who wrote many beautiful and inspiring songs in Russian nd in Yiddish. Last year he died suddenly in Odessa in the midst of the terible world war and for this reason the world did not take as much notice of his emise as his great poetic genius deserved. When a hurricane spreads its stormwings, howls its dreadful defiance, weeps on and smites the giants of the orest, lashes the ocean depths into foamng fury, carries death and destruction into town and hamlet, opens the floodates of desolation and sends a surge of orrow into the hearts of the living, man does not stop to listen to the babbling brook and the rythmic run of rill and rivulet. The God of war, too, comes like a hurricane and horrifies the heart of the world. In the din of battle even he richest and the best lives pass away lmost unnoticed. All the powerful pulations of pleasure, all the throbbing thrills of joy which their inspiring thoughts had given to mankind are uneeded. Even the voice of the sweetest singer dies away unguarded. Samuel Frug surely deserved a better fate, and he least that we can do now to help to fight the wrong which has been inflicted upon this Jewish bard, who sang so many melodious songs in Russian and in Yiddish, which brought inspiration and conolation to the despairing life of his brethren, the Russian Jews, is to pay a ribute of recognition to his memory on he first anniversary of his death by reounting the story of his noble life and by presenting to English readers some of his best poems in English translaions.

Simeon Samuel Frug first saw the light of day in 1860, smiled upon by the wide xpanse of blue sky, surrounded bv many ar-stretching acres of cultivated land nd by the majestic forest. The birds nd the bees greeted his coming with heir songs and hums, Mother Earth wafted her refreshing odors into his radle, and the rushing river sang his irst lullaby. For his cradle stood in the illage of Borowiki'kut, in one of the ewish colonies in the government of Kherson, on the shores of the Dnieper, ounded by Nicholas I. His parents were plain and simple Jewish farmer folk and, ike all the Jews, they sent their child to "cheder" to learn to read the Hebrew prayers, to study the Bible and selected parts of the Talmud.

At the age of nine he entered the vilage school, where he studied Russian or three years. When he became sixeen he left his home and went to the city of Kherson, there he found employment in the office of the crown rabbi and here he completed by self-instruction his education in Russian and Hebrew. In he office of the rabbi he had charge of he birth register and came in contact with Jewish life in all its phases. He earned to know its joys and griefs, its poverty and riches, its tears of anguish nd of gladness, its sacred and elevating moments of communion with God on Sabbaths and festivals and its degrading days of grinding persecution, its happiness of home and its sorrows in the outside world. All these contradictory emotions and feelings made a deep impression upon his poetic soul and became ater the keynote of his songs, especially of his Yiddish poems.

His first Russian poem he published in 1880 in the "Razswiet," a Russian Jewish periodical, which was followed by many others in different magazines and which took the hearts of the Russian readers by storm. Frug was the first one to carry into Russian literature the Jewish sigh, the Jewish longing, the Jewish plea for right and justice and the exquisite beauty of Jewish legends and ballads, and the latter became very popular with the Russian-reading public. The following is a translation of one of his famous Russian ballads, rendered into English blank verse by J. Schneyer:

The Holy Goblet

"O, tell me, is't true, my dear mother—
My grandpa is telling me so—
That there is in Heaven a Goblet
Which stands at the throne of the Lord;
Whenever misfortune befalls us,
Inflicted by merciless men,
A tear in that Goblet is falling
From the sorrowful eyes of the Lord.

"And the moment the Goblet is full of
The tears from the eyes of Jehova,
On earth then Messiah will come,
The Same One, whose glory is chanted in prayer,
The Same One for Whom our unfortunate people
Are waiting and waiting so long."

. . . . . .

"'My dear little darling, 'tis true, 'tis sacred,'
Thus sadly the mother replied.
The child thoughtfully hushed for a moment,
And queries soon after again:
'O when, my dear mother, O when will the Goblet
Be full of the tears of the Lord?
Does torture and misery dry them?
Or is there no bottom at all?'

"And full of true kindness, and full of caresses,
Its bright and its innocent glances
As mother directed the child.
And thinking and sighing, the mother was standing,
The tears in her eyelashes lurking and trembling,
Here, sparkling like diamonds, they fall
Upon the child's golden and beautiful curls;
And here on the forehead they roll. . . ."

Among his many Russian poems are real masterpieces. His "Rabbi Annon," for instance, made the profoundest impression and brought him many laurels. He was haled as a leading Russian poet and a great future was predicted for him. But, alas, soon came the terrible years of the pogroms and his heart ached for the masses of his suffering people. He longed to console and encourage them and they knew no other language but Yiddish. It was in the 80's when he first started to write in Yiddish, for which he had no love, but the appeal of the intense tragedy of the life of the millions of his brethren was too strong for him. In their own language he poured out his heart to them and for them. In his Yiddish poems he interpreted their dreams, treasured their tears and hallowed their hopes. He enriched the then very poor Jewish native idiom with the flowing expressions of beautiful thoughts, in which he showed that he suffered with them, wept with them and prayed with them. In it he took their relentless enemies and cruel oppressors to task and pleaded before God for the speedy redemption of his people. The following poem, which I translate for the "News" from the Yiddish, is one of his best, and is a good example of the grandeur and glory of his poetic genius:

Sand and Stars

The moon is clear, the stars are bright,
O'er hill and dale is spread the night.
The good old book before me lies,
I read and read with eager eyes.

I read the precious sacred words
And hear a voice this book records:
"I swear, my people, as stars you'll be
And as the sand on shore of sea"!

O, ne'er one sound is lost, or word,
Of all Thy vows, O Sovereign Lord!
Fulfilled must be Thy will in grace
In proper time, in proper place.

One thing, indeed, has been achieved—
This knows and feels my heart aggrieved:
We have become as sand so free
For ev'ry foot to grind in glee.

O, yes, good God, like stones and sand,
Dispersed and strewn in every land. . . .
To shame and scorn a constant prey,
But stars, my God, O where are they?

It was Frug who first introduced the charms of nature into Yiddish literature, of which fact Harold Berman wrote so pertinently, when he stated the following in his article on Frug in the "American Hebrew" at the time of the poet's death: "Of all the Russo-Jewish poets he was the only one who did not arrive at Parnassus via the Bet-Hamidrash, the schoolhouse of the ghetto, far removed from nature and life. These people grew up, as a rule, in utter ignorance of nature's laws, beauties and charms. The four walls of the schoolhouse constituted their entire world, and when they grew up and decided to become "enlightened", it was Mapu's ancient Hebrew romances or Abramovitz's nature history that imparted to them the great "secret", told them that trees were green and beautiful, grass soft and velvety, that flowers smelled sweet and brooks babbled. Frug did not need to be told all this. With him the love and affection of nature was innate and indigenous, and what he did have to learn to understand was the town, the ugly and prosaic town, with its cramping artificiality and confinement. For it was nature (as he sings of himself) that "Taught me to sing and play,

Taught me to think and feel,
And directed in measure my crude lay".

or

"Come with me into the wood
To refresh our strength,
With soft shoots of green
Thy tired soul we'll garland.
With a gentle, sweet breeze,
We'll thy heart fan.
With a lively, entrancing dream
Thee refresh and delight".

"And therein lies his tragedy, therein lay the secret of his lifelong misery, if, albeit, also his greatness. Feeling himself a thorough-going Russian, the Russians about him nevertheless persist in considering him a Jew, a Pariah, an outcast, and while he inwardly feels that his roots are cast in the soil and properly belong there, his neighbors think differently and practically drive him into town, and while he dotes on his rich Russian tongue, he is obliged to speak in the, by him, despised Yiddish vernacular to his people".

Suffering as Frug did from the tragedy of his own fate because he was a son of his people, he was most fit to sing of the tragic fate of his brethren in suffering. He fully felt the burning pain of their wounded hearts and completely understood the dreadful disadvantages of their distressful life. They therefore appreciated the soothing and consoling lays of his gifted lyre, even if he often tore the soiled and sticky bandages from their sore spots and exposed their open wounds to their chagrin. They loved him like a dear brother and esteemed him like a faithful friend and all others who now read his inspired verses, in any language, must love, admire and esteem his memory, for "zekher tsaddik livrokho", the memory of the righteous is, indeed, a blessing.

REVIEW OF LATE EVENTS, ETC.

such work, that the B'nai B'rith workers would be recognized within the camps as far as looking after those who were sick, in extending invitations to entertainments, etc., and therefore suggested to Dr. Fox who had some business to attend to in Washington, to call on the War Department to ascertain whether Mr. Kraus understood the ruling of the War Department correctly, as the Order did not desire to take any action which might be disapproved by any branch of the Government. Dr. Fox wired from Washington:

"Your views are sustained. Mr. Fosdick rules that our workers need no credentials".

This letter was confirmed by a telegram from Mr. Fosdick to Mr. Kraus.

It is probable that some of the utterances by overzealous adherents of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work or by our members may cause not only ill-feeling, but resentment. We caution against it. No Jews in this country stand deservedly higher than some of the active leaders of the Jewish Board for Welfare Work. Some of them are members of our Order. We bespeak for them the good will of our members. Let there be but one rivalry between that Board and our organization, namely the test—which organization will make the best efforts and render the best service to the boys who are ready to sacrifice their lives for our country? Wherever the Jewish Board for Welfare Work has actually undertaken such work, let our members render personal service to the best of their ability to aid that Board in its efforts, but in places where we are doing the work we have a right to expect the hearty support not only of our members but of the entire community.

Mr. Butzel has seen fit to draw an indictment against us. If his indictment can be proven, we ought to disband our organization. We invite all American Jewry to judge our actions.

We also call attention to the fact that we cannot keep up our activities very long without financial assistance, and therefore apply for voluntary contributions. Mail them to Mr. M. E. Greenebaum, banker, 9 S. La Salle St., Chicago. Contributions will be acknowledged in the B'nai B'rith News. Do your duty. Do not wait and then forget—DO IT NOW. After you have done your duty, appeal to your neighbor to do likewise. Such work as we are doing at Rockford, at Battle Creek, at Des Moines, at Houston, at Alexandria, and other places is your work. The War Department of your country asks you to continue it and extend it. What will you do? Answer.

CONVENTION OF MENORAH SOCIETIES OF AMERICA

The plans for the coming New Year convention of the Menorah Societies of America, comprising university students and graduates, include three events of more than ordinary interest to the public: the evening of Jewish music at Carnegie Hall, Dec. 30, with Ernest Bloch, Leopold Godowsky, Elizabeth Gutman, Cantor Rosenblatt, and the New York Symphony Orchestra on the program; the American premiere of Pinski's "The Treasure", at the Neighborhood Playhouse; and a "Maccabaean Dinner" with over a thousand guests and a most notable list of speakers, to be held at Columbia University on Saturday evening, Dec. 29.

In addition to these outstanding events there will be an opening assembly meeting in the Horace Mann Anditorium, Columbia University, open to the public with several eminent speakers; two symposium luncheons, one on the "Jewish Student in American Universities", the other on "Jewish Reconstruction After the War"; a number of business sessions at which the Menorah activities and plans will be discussed; and a gathering of university graduates from all over the country to consider the formation of a Federation of Menorah Alumni or Graduate Societies.

Among the guests at the "Maccabaen Dinner" will be Ambassador Elkus, Hon. Bernard M. Baruch, M. Stephane Lauzanne of the French Mission, Captain David Albala of the Serbian Military Mission, Dr. John H. Finley, president of the University of the State of New York, Jacob H. Schiff, Justice Irving Lehman, Julius Rosenwald, Eugene Meyer, Jr., and others. The presentation of the distinguished Jewish members of the Council of National Defense who are giving their service to the country in the industrial management of the war will be a striking feature of the dinner, as will also the presence in a body, on a platform back of the speakers' table, of Menorah members now in the national service at the neighboring army camps, who will be the guests of the Menorah Association.

In a few short years, from a humble beginning with a dozen members at Harvard, the Menorah movement has grown so rapidly and substantially as to fairly defy explanation. With no propaganda to stimulate membership, and with a purely cultural appeal, the Menorah now numbers fifty-eight student societies in the leading universities of the United States and Canada and six graduate or community societies in scattered cities—New York, New Haven, Chicago, Cincinnati, Montgomery and New Orleans.

The hold of the Menorah idea on the college man is too strong to be shaken off after graduation, and so an insistent demand has arisen for the formation of Graduate or Community Menorah Societies to gather together both those who have been members of college Menorahs in their student days and others to whom the Menorah idea has made a strong appeal. Neither the democracy nor the broad-mindedness of Menorah men would stand for the exclusion of those who have not had a college education, and so the Menorah movement in the most inevitable way has expanded beyond the college walls and bids fair to work the same cultural revolution in the community that it has already worked in the universities.

The extraordinary excellence of "The Menorah Journal" and its constantly widening influence on the general Jewish public has been to a large degree accountable for the spread of the Menorah idea into the community.

Among the men who have taken an active interest in the work of the Menorah societies and have helped to establish the Menorah College of Lecturers, "Menorah Professorships", Menorah Essay Prizes, Menorah Libraries, The Menorah Journal, the Menorah Bulletin, and other features of the Menorah work are: Justice Brandeis, Judge Julian W. Mack, Justice Irving Lehman, Ambassador Elkus, Dr. Charles W. Eliot, President Schurman of Cornell, President Hadley of Yale, Judge Meyer Sulzberger, Jacob H. Schiff, Adolph Lewisohn, Louis Marshall, Julius Rosenwald, Bernard M. Baruch, Dr. J. L. Magnes, Professor Richard Gottheil, Professor Israel Friedlaender, Dr. Stephen S. Wise, S. C. Lamport, Joseph H. Cohen, Jacob H. Cohen, Jacob Wertheim, S. R. Travis, L. E. Kirstein, Eugene Meyer, Jr., Joseph M. Proskauer, David A. Brown, Jacob Billikopf, and many others.

The unique Evening of Jewish Music at Carnegie Hall and the Maccabaean dinner will both be open to the public, and those who would like to attend are urged to make early application to the Menorah headquarters, at 600 Madison Ave., New York.

Los Angeles Lodge, Los Angeles, Cal.

A "working" visit to the B'nai B'rith lodges of California and Nevada was paid by Grand President David N. Mosessohn of District No. 4. He was accompanied by Mrs. Mosessohn. They visited Del Monte and Santa Barbara the first few days of their visit and arrived in Los Angeles on Nov. 7. Commencing with a luncheon, at which a large number of the active workers of the local lodge were gathered, Mr. Mosessohn was kept busy almost constantly. The matter of increased membership was given a great deal of attention, with the result that renewed vigor was given those present.

On Thursday night, Nov. 8, a reception was tendered Mr. and Mrs. Mosessohn in the B'nai B'rith Building, at which over 400 of the leading Jews of Los Angeles were present. Addresses were delivered by Rabbis S. Hecht and Liknaitz and the Grand President. The program also included a reading by Miss Van Grove, a monologue by P. Woodruff, a piano solo by Ella Rachlin, a vocal solo by Gerald Goldwater, and remarks by Charles Greenberg, president of Los Angeles Lodge. Mrs. Ellis Brockow presided.

What Our Lodges Are Doing

MANHATTAN LODGE, NO. 156, N. Y.

Manhattan Lodge, true to its past, has been in the forefront in wartime. It has subscribed for $2,000 Liberty Bonds and gave $100 to the Jewish Board for Welfare Work in the United States Army and Navy. At the last meeting came the call for funds for the B'nai B'rith work outside of camps and cantonments, with the suggestion of the district president that the lodge funds be not encroached on for the purpose. A subscription from the members present brought in $89, which will be considerably augmented, no doubt, by gifts from others not present.

Besides giving money, the lodge has given service also. Several of the members have enlisted and others have been called. A number were rejected for one minor cause or another, but are determined to get "over there," and are in a fair way of succeeding. Two, in fact, have already been successful. One of the brethren, William H. Sternberg, is in charge of the medical supply depot at 1210 Arch street, Philadelphia, which caters to the medical wants of the several army camps and forts in the northeastern and eastern military departments of the country. His brother, Nathaniel H. Sternberg, is a private at the same depot and expects to be in France by the beginning of the next year.

The lodge, which has steadily increased in membership during the past two years, started out last January with the slogan to "double its membership in 1917". Though losing many of its older members, it has increased 40 net during the year, having now 262, with half a dozen more waiting initiation. The members have an idea of following up the Chicago plan of a few large lodges for the city rather than a lot of smaller ones without influence, and the result is that as a beginning a movement is under way to amalgamate with Washington No. 19. If successful, as it promises to be, the slogan for 1917 will come pretty close to being a fact. This will be only a beginning, in all likelihood, and Manhattan and Wishington combined will undoubtedly finally be an ideal lodge in numbers, financial strength and positive influence in the community.

SIOUX CITY LODGE, SIOUX CITY, IOWA.

Brother H. D. Frankel of St. Paul, first vice-president of the District Grand Lodge, and Brother Dr. George Fox, temporarily of Chicago, secretary of the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League of the I. O. Upon their arrival in Sioux City, the visitors were met by Brothers Rabbi Sternheim and M. Davidson, who escorted them to a hotel, where the president and secretary of the lodge joined the party for a conference, outlining plans for B'nai B'rith activities. Calgary Lodge, No. 816, of Calgary, Alberta, Canada, has arranged an "At Home" to be given by the members of the lodge to their friends on the 27th of December. The result of this affair will no doubt be an increased membership of the lodge.

John Hay Lodge, No. 634, of Fargo, N. D., will observe B'nai B'rith Day on Jan. 13, 1918, and installation of officers for the ensuing term will also be held on that date.

Installation of officers for the ensuing term and the initiation of a class of candidates by Bay City Lodge, No. 178, of Bay City, Mich., is scheduled for Jan. 13, 1918. Representatives of the Grand Lodge will be in attendance to address the lodge.

Winnipeg Lodge, No. 650, of Winnipeg, Can., is arranging to observe B'nai B'rith Day towards the end of January. Invitation has been extended to the president of the District, Edward Sonnenschein, to honor the occasion with his presence.

DISTRICT NO. 7.

James K. Gutheim Lodge, No. 439, of New Orleans, La., held a special meeting on Nov. 15, 1917. The purpose of the meeting was the occasion of the hundredth anniversary of the birth of the late Rabbi Gutheim whose honored name the lodge bears. Special memorial services were held under the auspices of the lodge.

Ohaves Zdoka Lodge, No. 822, was instituted at Brownsville, Texas, on Nov. 25, with 23 charter members.

SKETCHES OF MODERN JEWISH HISTORY.

visiting Paris on his mission in 1777, records in his diary with profound grief that some of the Paris Jews, most of whom were of Portuguese descent, told him plainly that they were free thinkers in religion, and lived the same frivolous life which was characteristic of Paris society of these days. It is worthy of note that among the notable exceptions, he mentions a Naquet family, who were his hosts, but a member of this family, Alfred Naquet, a noted chemist and politician, who died Nov. 11, 1916, was the most determined leader of the present secularist movement in France. "Univers Israelit" says of him: "Born in Judaism, he never knew the religion of his fathers. He was a rabid free thinker, who went so far as to arrange a banquet for Yom Kippur. The enemies of Judaism have charged us with responsibility for Naquet, to whose efforts the passage of the divorce law was mainly attributed."

At this period Mendelssohn's Pentateuch was published. It would be entirely wrong to consider it a reform movement, if we restrict the meaning of this term to the advocacy of a deviation from traditional Jewish concepts. It may be said from the start that Mendelssohn conformed strictly to Jewish orthodoxy, declaring the Pentateuch to be the work of Moses from the first to the last letter, written in every detail under divine inspiration. He also explained the Pentateuch law in every instance in accordance with rabbinic theology. The only departure from tradition was that he used in his translation correct literary German, instead of the Yiddish of the older translation. No sooner, however, had the first specimen of this translation appeared, when the leading rabbis of that time protested strongly against this innovation. It was very hard for them to find a real ground for the charges of heresy, and in this respect a sermon preached by Phineas Horowitz of Frankfurt-am-Main (1730-1805) is as typical as it is amusing. Mendelssohn had translated the passage in Leviticus 19:18: "You may rebuke your neighbor". Rabbi Horowitz is furious at this "perversion of Jewish doctrine". The rabbis consider this passage a mandatory law, declaring it the duty of every Jew to rebuke his neighbor when he sees him commit something wrong. He must persist in this rebuke until he is bodily maltreated. If, so Horowitz argues, we make of this law a mere moral advice, all the laws of the Torah would cease to be binding, and in this way Judaism would soon become extinct. He calls Mendelssohn's enterprise an iniquity, which was committed in Israel, and admonishes his hearers not to touch this book. More exhilarating is the criticism of another rabbi, whose name, unfortunately, has not been recorded. He takes exception to Mendelssohn's spelling of the name of God as "Gott", while the older translation had spelled it "Got". According to the old spelling, the rabbi argues, the numerical value of the Hebrew letters is 13, which again is equal to the numerical value of the letters composing the word "Echad", the Hebrew for "one". Mendelssohn with his modernized spelling, therefore, shows that he does not believe in the unity of God, which is the fundamental dogma of Judaism.

Another objection of a similarly amusing nature is directed against the use of the word "altar", while the former Yiddish translators had retained the Hebrew word "Mizbeach". The objection to the use of the word "altar" is due to the supposed derivation of this word from the Hebrew "Al-tahor" (unclean). The critic did not know that the word "altar" was used by the German Jews of the fifteenth century, and is found in the Responsa of Jacob Weil of Nuremberg for the pulpit of the synagogue. The most comical objection of all is preserved by Moses Mendelsohn (1782-1861) of Hamburg, the uncle of the orthodox leader, Samson R. Hirsch. This man, a Hebrew author of some merit, who knew Hartwig Wessely, one of Mendelssohn's co-workers, personally reports that a rabbi was indignant because Mendelssohn translated the passage Exodus 31:15, which the revised version renders as a Sabbath of solemn rest, as a holy day of the first class. Here Mendelssohn showed his wickedness, placing the Sabbath on one level with the Hamburg lottery (Klassenlotterie). One of the rabbi's disciples went still farther and declared that Mendelssohn's wickedness is apparent in the fact that not only did he place the Sabbath on one level with the Hamburg lottery, but he showed his contempt for it by ascribing to it the first class, which is the cheapest in the lottery, instead of at least making it a day of the fourth class.

If we wish to be historically just, we must not lay too much stress on these details. The real objection which these rabbis had was their unconscious, or, at best, subconscious feeling that using correct German in the elementary instruction of the Jewish youth, would in course of time, as in fact it did, lead to absolute secularism in Jewish education. This fact is perhaps most strongly evident in the effect of this departure on Mendelssohn's younger contemporaries. Herz Homberg (1759-1841), a native of Lieben, a suburb of Prague, who afterwards became a coworker of Mendelssohn, writing the commentary to the two last books of the Pentateuch, and a tutor in his house, reports that at the age of seventeen, while he was quite an accomplished scholar in Talmudic literature, he was unable to even read German, and when he began to make up for this deficiency, he, like many others, sympathizing with him in the Yeshibah of Glogau, was threatened with the loss of their means of support, which consisted of free meals, given to them by members of the congregation. Similar is the experience of Homberg's contemporary, Peter (Perez) Beer of Neubydzow, Bohemia (1758-1838). Beer was raised in a somewhat more liberal environment. The local Catholic priest, who took an interest in the promising boy, offered to give him lessons in German and Latin. The father consented after considerable struggle, insisting that the boy must devote eight hours a day to the study of the Talmud. At the age of fourteen he was sent to the Yeshibah of Prague. The chief rabbi, Ezekiel Landau, heard that the young student read German books. He called him into his presence and placed before him the alternative of either giving up his ambition of secular scholarship, or withdrawing from the Yeshibah. Ezekiel Landau was placed in a difficult position. Emperor Joseph II enforced secular education by law, and the congregation of Prague was amongst the first to act in accordance with the Emperor's wishes, establishing a secular school in 1782. The rabbi, therefore, could only indirectly express his views. He does so in his commentary on the Talmudic story of Rabbi Eliezer, who, on his deathbed, admonished his disciples to keep away from "Higayon" (philosophy), which Rabbi Ezekiel very boldly interprets as inarticulate sounds, declaring that the rabbi warned against the pedagogic system, which proposed to teach Hebrew grammatically, instead of the old-fashioned way of beginning with the study of Talmud at the earliest possible age. Rabbi Ezekiel also expressed his ideas indirectly in a rather sinister recommendation, which he writes as a preface to a collection of sermons, published by his disciple and successor, Eleazar Fleckeles (1754-1826). Landau is opposed to new books, but he makes an exception in this case, feeling that the desire for novelty might be gratified by Hebrew books, and thus prevent people from turning to German literature, which practice is spreading rather alarmingly. Fleckeles takes a compromising attitude. He condemns Mendelssohn's translation of the Pentateuch, but recommends the study of the German language.

The school in Prague had come to stay until with the new school legislation it had become superfluous because Jews sent their children to the public schools. It was preceded by a school, opened in Berlin in 1778, which with some intermissions and changes is still in existence. Secularism had won the day, just as the rabbis of the old school had feared and predicted.

THE AMERICAN SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' WELFARE LEAGUE.

The inspiring and eloquent sentiments expressed on that occasion will long be remembered by all present. Space does not permit an elaborate report of the eloquent remarks of the major, of Mr. Livingston, and of the Rev. Connolly to the soldiers present there, as well as to the civilians, and there will always be a special recollection to the incisive and eloquent oratory of the Adjutant General Colonel Heistand, who drew storms of applause from the assemblage when he said: "I would rather be crucified head down and America live, than America die and I survive". A silent tribute with a full realization of its tremendous import and meaning was the answer to his statement: "The independence of this country was written in blood, and it must be rewritten in blood". Those present will not soon forget those remarks of Colonel Heistand nor the rest of the remarkable addresses delivered that afternoon.

It is planned to hold entertainments for the boys every Sunday afternoon, so far as camp routine and our own facilities for doing this work will permit. For Dec. 16, the boys themselves are arranging a minstrel show. For Sunday entertainments the Sinai Center Players, the Hebrew Institute of Chicago and others are arranging to send us various sorts of entertainments.

The kitchen is now being equipped. Patriotic ladies of Chicago have agreed to put at the disposal of our organization weekly, sufficient refreshments to be served to all the boys when they come to our headquarters on Sunday. Others who have heretofore sent such refreshments to individual soldiers have kindly acceded to my request that the eatables be distributed here in a general way. The distribution of these refreshments has been undertaken by the Jewish women of Rockford, who, together with the Jewish men of the community, have, I am happy to state, aided our cause in every way at their command. Smokes, sweaters, mufflers, socks, etc., have been distributed as they have been received, to all soldiers who desire them, affording us an opportunity of demonstrating in those features in which happily an opportunity is afforded us by the character of the work itself to do such service, that our work is for Jewish and non-Jewish alike.

Our attendance at Rockford varies from 25 on week days to an attendance of 150 on Saturdays and Sundays; however, at the two large affairs the attendance was much larger, as indicated.

A gala day. in our headquarters at Rockford was Dec. 9, when 600 members of the Young Peoples Jewish Congress, among whom were over 400 young women properly chaperoned, gave the boys at Rockford a treat. The more than 600 men were fully appreciative of this affair and never before in the history of Rockford has there been such a gathering of Jews. This was in the nature of a Chanukkah treat, and the Chanukkah service having been atoned and an appropriate address made. One of the surprises of the afternoon was the singing of the Italian operatic singer, Carlo Lasco, accompanied by Private Meyer Spiro. The 343rd Infantry Band furnished the music, and dancing was indulged in. This affair is perhaps the largest single affair that has ever been given anywhere for the men in uniform. Nothing like it had ever been seen by any of those present.

It was an inspiring sight to see 600 men in uniform gathered at our headquarters, and if any one ever doubted the effectiveness of the work which the I. O. B. B. has undertaken for the men outside of the camp this one event alone ought to be enough to convince them of their error.

RIGHTS FOR NATIVE JEWS IN TURKESTAN.

A deputation of the native Turkestan Jews, consisting of M. M. Herzfield, Fuzailov, Shifron and Kalantayeff, visited Petrograd and drew the attention of the government to the anomalous position of our native coreligionists in Russian Central Asia, generally known as the Bokhara Jews, but in reality subjects of no state since the conquest of Turkestan by Russia. Under the old regime they were given the right to apply individually for Russian citizenship, but their applications were seldom considered. The government, on hearing the case as put forward by the deputation, ordered the immediate recognition of all Jews of Turkestan, who were not subjects of other states as Russian citizens. Native Jews who were subjects of other states were permitted to apply for naturalization in the usual course. When the deputation brought the new charter to Turkestan, large crowds of Jews assembled and cheered free Russia and the delegates.

V · EDUCATION.

The leading problems in the adaptation of the Jews to the conditions, created by the improvement of their political situation, was that of the education of the youth. There are a great many definitions of the real object of education. I prefer to define education as the attempt of transmitting the achievements of the past to posterity. The savage who learned to convert the rock, which he used to throw at game, into an arrowhead; his wife, who learned to grind the grain instead of chewing it, and spitting the husk, transmitted these achievements to their posterity, who again tried to improve on the experiences of their elders.

For the Jews, at the end of the seventeenth century, the problem in addition aimed at giving the children the opportunity of availing themselves of the advantages, either granted or promised to them by the rulers, who were in some way influenced by the more humanitarian principles of the age. Perhaps nothing can better illustrate the gradual change of the state of culture amongst the Jews of western Europe than the comparison between Moses Mendelssohn (1729-1886) and Samson Raphael Hirsch (1808-1888). The former aimed at secularizing the education of the Jews. He published the Pentateuch, with a German translation, printed in Hebrew characters, and added to it a commentary in the Hebrew language. This book was published in 1783. The latter wished to preserve to a secularized generation the religious ideals which existed uncontested up to Mendelssohn's time. He published the Pentateuch, the first part of which appeared in 1867, with a German translation printed in German characters, and with a commentary written in German. Thus within eighty years the spiritual life of the Jews had changed completely. The reformer—to use the popular term—of 1783 addressed a progressive public in Hebrew or in German, printed in Hebrew characters. The orthodox of 1867 addressed the conservative public in the German language and used German characters.

Complaints about the ignorance of religion in a certain age must not be taken too seriously. They are usually exaggerated. Yet in their exaggeration they present a picture of the time. The translator of a Passover Hagadah into Yiddish, published in Fuerth in 1797, gives as reason for his literary work the decline of the knowledge of Hebrew. His statement deserves to be given literally, as a typical specimen of the Yiddish of that period, and of that country. He says: "Weil aber Ba-awonosenu horabbim in den Dor das meinste Leit, Mannspersonen wenig Loshen Hakodesh varstenen, mikolschken Weiber un Kinder varstenen peshite niks, drum haben mir die Hagodeh vun Loshen Hakodesh auf teitsch gebracht".

Typical specimens of the state of culture can only be gathered indirectly, from occasional statements, found in various books. In 1808 Napoleon issued a law requiring that all the Jews of France register the family names which they from now on would assume. In Reichshofen, Alsace, thirty-seven men and forty-seven women registered on this occasion. Of the men, eleven signed their names in German, the others in Hebrew. Of the women only six could sign their names in Yiddish characters, the others could not write at all. The city of Karlsbad possessed from Middle Ages the privilege not to admit any Jew to permanent residence. This law could never be strictly carried out, because exceptions were made for those who would come to use the waters, and for others living in the neighborhood, who would come during the season for business. By the usual methods of bribe and personal influence with officials, some Jews would remain there during the winter, until through the complaint of the local citizens, or through the zeal of an official, an attempt was made to enforce the law. Such an expulsion took place in 1824. Twelve Jews were called to the office of the mayor and were ordered to leave the city. They had to sign the statement that they had understood this order. Of these twelve three signed in German, two in Yiddish and five could not write at all. David Loewy (1821-1902), a native of Eidlitz, a town not far from Karlsbad, teacher and author of popular works on Judaism, reports in his memoirs that the old people whom he knew in his boyhood objected to the teaching of grammar, which was a favorite subject in the pedagogy of that time. They said that God has given to man the power of speech, and it was not necessary to learn it from books. Perhaps the most typical of all instances that might be quoted is a note, written by Nathan Rothschild (1777-1836), the first of the family to settle in England. It is dated 1810, and typical for the intellectual as well as for the social life of that period. The future multimillionaire, even at that time a very rich man, makes an appointment to arrange some business affairs in London. The letter was written by his clerk in English. Rothschild adds a few lines in Yiddish, asking that his friend reserve for him and his bookkeeper a room with two beds. A hotel was evidently an extravagance, even for Nathan Rothschild, and Yiddish was handier to him than German, leave alone English.

Taking this case as typical, it is easily understood that the Jewish fathers at that time felt that their children should be better equipped for their future career. The rich provided for such needs by private tutors. At the same time they considered it their duty to assist the children of the poor. The first attempt along this line was made in 1761 in Berlin by two wealthy Jews, Veitel Heine Ephraim and Daniel Itzig. They asked the government for the permission to open a school, where twelve children should receive both Jewish and secular education. For unknown reasons this project did not materialize, and it was not until 1778 that the Jewish Free School in Berlin, the first of its kind, was opened. Others followed in rapid succession. Breslau established a "Wilhelmschule" in 1791, in spite of the opposition of its orthodox rabbi. This opposition, it must be said right now, was perhaps not so much dictated by hostility to an elementary secular education, which would have been conceded from the point of view of its value in earning a livelihood, but by distrust of the teachers, who were filled with the rationalistic spirit of the age. This policy of the new education is clearly indicated in the case of Breslau, where the principal received the instruction to teach besides the religious practices, "pure morality, love of fellowmen and loyalty to the state". "Pure morality" was the principle emphasized as the real object of education by the German pedagog, Basedow, then the highest authority on pedagogy.

The emphasis, laid on morality over ritualistic and dogmatic religion, is evident in the name given to the first Jewish school established in Frankfort-am-Main in 1804. It is called "Philanthropin". The history of this school is of more than local interest. The first attempt to establish a Jewish school in Frankfurt, in which secular subjects were to be taught, was made in 1794. The local rabbi, Phineas Horowitz (1730-1805), like all rabbis in large congregations at that time, a native of Poland, denounced this project as he had denounced Mendelssohn's Pentateuch. He anathematized all those who would take part in this institution, and although the Senate compelled him to repeal the ban, the project did not materialize until ten years later. Ten years make, occasionally, a great difference in history. The same Rabbi Horowitz, who in 1782 had so bitterly denounced Mendelssohn's translation of the Pentateuch, in 1803, not only tolerated, but warmly endorsed, the German translation of the prayerbook by Wolf Heidenheim (1755-1832), still known today as the "Roedelheim Siddur". Heidenheim did nothing different from what Mendelssohn had done. He substituted a correct German for the former Yiddish translation of the prayerbook, and added a Hebrew commentary to it. The two decades, however, had produced a change in Horowitz' views, because the age had changed. It was impossible now to continue in the opposition to secular education, and for the same reason neither Phineas Horowitz, who died in 1805, nor his son, and successor, Hirsch, who held the office of chief rabbi of Frankfurt until 1815, made an attempt to interfere with the "Philanthropin". This institution, like many others, enjoyed the strong support of the government. Its directors, leaders in communal life, availed themselves of the income from bequests, left by pious Jews of olden times for Talmudic education, and utilized it for the maintenance of the school. The orthodox protested, but the Senate decided that these funds were intended for the education of the youth, and were better utilized in making the boys "sittlich und geistig gebildet" than if they were applied to instruction in Talmud. This school, existing today as a high school recognized by the government as equal to the public high schools, owed its foundation to an accident. Old Mayer Amschel Rothschild, while on business in Darmstadt, noticed a Polish Jewish boy of fourteen begging from door to door. He took him to Frankfurt, gave him to his bookkeeper, Sigmund Geisenheimer, the same for whom Nathan ordered the room in London, and placed a sum of money at his disposal so that the boy should be brought up as a decent man. The object failed of realization. The boy was born and bred to be a Schnorrer, and soon ran away from Frankfurt to fulfill his destiny. Geisenheimer, however, had some money in his hands, and received some more from other friends, so that he felt it would not be right to devote this sum to the education of one boy, and he set out to establish a school.

The increase of Jewish schools, naturally, suggested the establishment of normal schools, where Jewish teachers should receive the proper training. The first institution of this kind was opened in Cassel in 1810. Others followed, and there are today six institutions of this kind in Germany, and a few more in Russia, where they have an entirely private character, and finally one in Paris, established by the Alliance Israelite for the training of teachers for its schools in the Orient.

All religious history shows us the peculiarity that innovations, first fought bitterly by the orthodox, are after awhile adopted and utilized for their own aims. Hamburg, up to this day a stronghold of orthodoxy, established a Talmudtorah, existing today, in 1805, which included secular education in its curriculum. Seligman Baer Bamberger, rabbi of Wuerzburg, the most uncompromising leader of modern orthodoxy, established in 1864 a normal school for teachers The orthodox patrons of Palestine, who sixty-odd years ago declared through the mouth of their leader, the banker, Hirsch Lehren (1784-1853) of Amsterdam, that neither a teacher nor a physician should ever be allowed to set foot in Jerusalem, have now established a "gymnasium" in Jaffa.

In Austria the modernization of education was largely due to the efforts of Emperor Joseph II (1780-1790). His order that all Jews should receive secular education, either in schools of their own or in the Christian schools, were, like so many other well intended measures of this noble philanthropist, evidently not carried out. The best proof, if any were needed, is the case of Karlsbad quoted above. The first community to act on the emperor's order was that of Prague, which established its "Normalschule" in 1782. The term, by the wav does not mean a normal school in the sense in which this term is understood in English, but a primary school conducted in accordance with the norm, laid down by the state authorities. Smaller congregations must have followed this example, although we do not possess a complete record of the progress of this movement. The congregation of Presburg, up to this day a stronghold of orthodoxy, opened a "Juedisch-deutsche Nationalschule" in 1783. Peter Beer, mentioned before as a representative of the most pugnacious rationalism, became in 1783 teacher in Mattersdorf, a place not far from Presburg and, like the latter city, still the seat of a Yeshibah, conducted on the ideals of the eighteenth century, and two years later he was made principal of the Jewish school of his birthplace, Neu Bydzow, Bohemia.

The material assistance given to the charitable object of the education of the poor was noticed in connection with the first attempt to establish a school in Berlin, and with the foundation of the "Philanthropin" of Frankfurt. Similar cases are found elsewhere and lead us to the presentation of acts of philanthropy by wealthy Jews, who, placed in a more favorable position than their coreligionists, considered it their duty to assist the latter in rising to a higher plane of existence. It would in itself be an alluring task to present the situation of these wealthy financiers, usually called "Court-Jews". The subject, however, is so complex and so large that in this connection we have to limit ourselves to a few remarks. Even in Middle Ages, when Jews were kept in a state of outlawry, there were always found some individuals who, as physicians and financiers, and in exceptional cases as literary men and as scientists, obtained the favor of the ruler, who placed them on a higher level of citizenship than the average Jew. We find such cases frequently in Spain in the thirteenth century, when some kings exempt their "Alfaquims" from all taxes, from the obligation of wearing the yellow badge, and from the jurisdiction of the rabbinical courts. At the same time we learn occasionally—this condition of the sources is the main difficulty of Jewish history—from the books of the famous rabbi, Meir of Rothenburg (1220-1293), that a Jew had received from the German emperor, probably Rudolf of Hapsburg, exemption from all Jewish taxes. This condition continues into the eighteenth century. At that time Jacob Reischer (1660-1733), rabbi of Worms and Metz, is asked to render a decision in the case of a Jew, who was granted exemption from all taxes by the ruler, and is willing to contribute voluntarily to the congregational expenses, but refuses to be assessed. The harder the legal situation of the average Jew was, the more we find such favors granted to individuals. This is especially the case in Poland, where Jewish physicians and tax farmers are given great privileges, and in Mohammedan countries, as in Turkey, where a Jew, Joseph Nasi, was in the sixteenth century made Duke of Naxos. I hasten to add that, in my opinion, this title does not mean monarchical privileges, but is to be understood as financial administrator of the revenues of the island.

Such men were the natural protectors and benefactors of their opperssed coreligionists. A contemporary of Don Joseph Nasi, probably supported by him, is Elijah de Vidas, in Tiberias, Palestine. He reports in his book that it is customary for the wealthy Jews to maintain those who devote their whole life to the Torah. Some of them establish or maintain institutions where the Torah was to be studied all the time. The object is mostly the fulfillment by proxy of the law, which requires that one meditate in the law day and night. Such institutions are called "Klaus" (cloister) although they do not include celibacy as the duty of the prebendary. Only as a secondary consideration the prebendary was to give lectures on the Talmud. We find such institutions very frequently all over Germany in the beginning of the eighteenth century. They are also found in wealthy congregations elsewhere, especially in Leghorn, and some of the wealthy Jews of the latter city would give a stipend to a rabbi living in Jerusalem. Wolfenbuettel had a court-Jew, named Herz Samson, who was also a Talmudic scholar, and maintained a rabbi in his home, for whom he provided through a bequest after his death, stipulating that this foundation continue for all times. Other members of his family followed the example, so that by the end of the eighteenth century there were in Wolfenbuettel three such prebendaries. Israel Jacobson, born in Halberstadt in 1768, married into that family, and being a man of great influence with the Duke of Brunswick, it was easy for him to obtain the permission of combining all these various funds, and establishing a school, which should furnish secular as well as religious education. The new institute was reorganized in 1807, under the name of "Samsonschule," and as such still exists, being recognized by the government as a high school. Two of its scholars, who were already enrolled at the time when the reorganization took place, were Leopold Zunz and Isaac M. Jost, both afterwards among the leading scholars on Jewish subjects. Israel Jacobson, of whose activity more shall be said in connection with the Reform movement, founded another school entirely from his own means, at Seesen in 1801, which also continues to exist today as a high school of officially recognized standing. Jacobson's object was to improve the economic, the social and the intellectual status of the Jewish boys. He therefore made provision that a number of places should be reserved to Christians, and he also expected to meet the objection of Jewish emancipation by turning the boys to agriculture and manual trades. It is highly important as evidence that the Jews are not to blame for the comparatively few mechanics and for the entire absence of agricultural industry, to learn that the noble philanthropist had a hard fight with the local population when he made known his object. The people of Seesen objected to the inclusion of manual training in the curriculum of the school, because they feared that, if the Jews would turn to agriculture, the price of farm land would rise. Even in regard to manual labor, which the Jews were supposed to shun, because they preferred to make a livelihood by the sweat of others, objection had to be met. The local mechanics demanded, and obtained from the duke, the promise that the young men, trained in manual labor, would not settle in their city.

It would make tedious reading were we to give a complete list of similar institutions, founded all over Germany at that time. As a case of special interest, we might quote that of Hanover, where Meyer Michael David, a court Jew, who was in direct personal contact with Mendelssohn, established such a school in 1798. This family also had originally given the funds for a "Klaus," which are today utilized in the maintenance of a normal school for Jewish teachers. The example spread to foreign countries. London converted its old-fashioned Talmudtorah, founded in 1770 for Hebrew instruction only, into the Jews' Free School, still existing today and said to be one of the largest schools in existence. Even Poland was touched by the new spirit. That part of the kingdom, which was annexed to Russia, fell into line first. In a petition, sent by the congregation of Rawitsch to the king in 1794, the complaint is voiced that the system of education, as it existed then, is insufficient. The language of instruction is Yiddish, and secular subjects are entirely neglected. The congregation then already suggests the establishment of a Jewish normal school, which, however, took fully thirty years before it was realized. Austrian Poland had the opportunity under Joseph II to build up an educational system in harmony with the spirit of the age. The Emperor, who, well meaning, but too impetuous as an executive, tried to build institutions from the top instead of from the ground, appointed Herz Homberg as superintendent of the Jewish school system of Galicia. The choice was a very bad one. Homberg's rationalism and his contempt for traditional Judaism could never gain the confidence of the people, who looked upon secular education as upon a scheme to lead them away from their religion. After a few years Homberg had to abandon his position. The efforts were more successful in places where they found the support of local men. Such was the case in Tarnopol, and in Brody, where such schools were opened in 1815, and soon exercised a beneficial influence.

Tarnopol had the good fortune to have in its midst a fine Hebrew scholar, Joseph Perl (1775-1839) who, fully conversant with the life of the people among whom he lived, succeeded in gathering around himself the progressive element of the city, and with their aid, and with the backing of the government, he succeeded in placing the school on a solid basis. He saw in the Hasidic element the strongest obstacle to his plans, and fought it in a brilliant Hebrew satire, which undoubtedly contributed much to his success. Brody again, being situated on the border of Russia, and a center of the export trade, had in its midst a number of wealthy merchants, who on their travels became acquainted with conditions in western Europe, and learned through their business to value secular education. The school, established there, aimed at a curriculum which was above the primary education, and unless it should have been closed owing to the war, which affected that city very badly by repeated evacuations, it is still in existence. The mention of its finances open to us also an opportunity to obtain an insight into communal affairs. Polish congregations largely depended for their maintenance on the "Korobka", a tax on kosher meat. It was usually levied in the same way in which the revenue for the Polish kingdom was levied. The congregation farmed it out to a contractor who had the right to charge a certain amount for the killing of cattle and fowl, and the Schochet was sworn not to perform his function without receiving a ticket, showing that the fee had been paid to the contractor. We find the same mode of raising revenue also in Oriental countries, where it is called "Gabella" Through the aid of the government which favored the cultural movement, part of the "Korobka" income was set aside for educational purposes. In Russia the same revenue was the only mode of taxation, because the Czar's government would not allow the Jews to organize as a corporation. Russia made some weak attempts under Alexander I to follow the example of her western neighbors. The minister, Derzhavin, appointed commission after commission to study the question how to improve the condition of the Jews. The Jewish physician, Dr. Frank, a native of Germany, who practiced in Russia, suggested such a scheme, but it did not result in lasting effects. A school, which was to give instruction from primary education to rabbinic studies, was established in Warsaw in 1818, but it never developed any healthy life. The only tangible result was that old-fashioned Talmudism became strengthened.

At the end of the eighteenth century, the part of Poland, which was annexed to Russia, shows in the Jewish community three distinct currents of spiritual life, the Talmudic, the Hasidic, and the progressive. It may perhaps not be entirely superfluous to state that with very few exceptions, consisting chiefly of the southern settlement, in territories, annexed from Turkey, and of those in the interior of Asia, like Bokhara, the bulk of the Russian Jews are the descendants of those found in the territory annexed from Poland. Up to 1772, when Russia grabbed the first part of Poland, there were practically no Jews in Russia. The Polish Jews since the sixteenth century, when they received a constant flow of immigrants from western Europe, were the masters of Talmudic study. They furnished, from the seventeenth century on, the rabbis and teachers for western Europe. From the latter half of the seventeenth century on, the mystic movement began to spread. Podolia, which was at that time under Turkish domination, offered the best means of communication with Turkey and from that country the followers of the Messianic pretender, Sabbatai Zebi, sent their missionaries first to all parts of Poland and then all over western Europe. They developed that Hasidic doctrine, which stands in the main for a more emotional interpretation of religion, which directly or indirectly discountenanced the old ideal of exclusive devotion to Talmudic studies, and of strict conformity with the ritual that became more and more pedantic with every generation. At the same time, the influence of the Mendelssohn school, and its message of broadening the intellectual life, found its way into the country. Among those who stood uncompromisingly for the traditional ideals of rabbinic Judaism was Elijah of Wilna (1720-1797), up to this day worshiped as the highest type of rabbinic scholarship and piety. He fought a battle of two fronts, both against secularism and against mysticism. One of his disciples, Hayim of Wolozhin, felt the call to continue his master's work, and he established in the little town of Wolozhin in the district of Wilna, a Yeshibah, which has remained under the supervision of his family up to this day, unless the war should have ended it, with the exception of a few years when autocracy, in one of its periodical whims, closed it. It was opened in 1803, a year before the "Philanthropin" at Frankfurt opened its doors. Thus almost at the same time we see the two tendencies of nineteenth century Judaism fighting for supremacy. In Frankfurt, the seat of so many prominent rabbis for centuries, a non-denominational religion tries to establish itself as a new interpretation of Judaism, and in Wolozhin the Judaism of the seventeenth century fights for its maintenance.

ANTI-SEMITISM IN RUSSIA.

Maxim Gorky, the celebrated Russian author and publicist, recently published an article about the share which the Jews have taken in the Russian revolution and the role which they are destined to play in the free Russia. He states:

"As a child I was raised in an environment in which there reigned an insane hatred for Jews, and I thoroughly believed in all the absurdities which the anti-Semites spread about them.

"My country, Russia, is again threatened with the danger of the rebirth of anti-Semitism.

"Equal rights for Jews is one of the greatest conquests of the Russian revolution. On the day when we have given equal rights to the Jews we have washed off an ugly and shameful stain from our conscience.

"I state this without special pride, because in our act there is no reason why we should be proud. They, the Jews, have fought for the Russian freedom with much more honor and with much more energy than the Russians themselves, and from their ranks came less traitors than from our own ranks. We therefore have no cause to look upon ourselves as the protectors of and the providers for the Jews, as some kind-hearted but short-sighted Russians are willing to consider themselves.

"Having freed the Jews from the 'Pale of Settlement,' with which the old government of the Czar has brought shame upon itself, we have gained the opportunity to utilize for our fatherland the energy of men and women who descend from a race which has much more working ability than we have.

"Does not everyone know, the Americans as well as the Russians, that Russia is now greatly in need of such men and women who love their work? We have no reason to be proud of having freed the Jews, but we really have a good reason to be glad that at last we have succeeded in accomplishing a piece of work which is moral and noble and which also has a great practical value.

"Today I do not yet see in Russia a special rejoicing in the fact that the Jews have been freed. It is possible that the reason for it is because Russia has not yet had time enough to indulge in general rejoicing. The country is too much sunk in that which is called 'high politics', the character of which is brilliantly expressed in a Russian proverb which says: 'Tigers love to eat marmalade, therefore men eat one another' ".

STOP POGROM AT KISHINEFF.

After much difficulty the pogrom started in Kishineff by soldiers was stopped. The soldiers had at first looted the wine shops, got drunk and then proceeded to rob Jewish houses and shops. The large number of Jewish soldiers stationed here had to undertake the defense of the Jewish population.

The Jewish soldiers of Kishineff issued the following statement and distributed it among the Christian soldiers:

"We see that our Jewish brethren are again in danger of pogroms. The position of our brothers and sisters who are in the power of the Black Hundred gives us no rest, and we are not, therefore, in the position to fulfill our duties to the fatherland and to the republic. We wish to believe that the revolutionary government will not permit such misdeeds and will protect the interests and the rights of the Jewish peoples.

"Let there rule in republican Russia liberty, equality and fraternity".

Every man, however good he may be, has a still better man dwelling in him which is properly himself, but to whom, nevertheless, he is often unfaithful.—Humboldt.

B'NAI B'RITH ASSUME CHARGE OF WELFARE BUILDING AT TACOMA.

Important Conference at Puget Sound City Decides on Co-Operative Plan for Welfare of Soldiers

At Tacoma on December 9 a conference of leading Jewish men and women of the Northwestern cities was held for the purpose of considering and organizing soldiers' welfare work in connection with the cantonment at Camp Lewis.

Rabbi Samuel Koch assumed charge of the meeting as acting chairman for the National Welfare Board of New York. Rabbi Eggleson, of Cincinnati, representing Col. Harry Cutler, the chairman of the national board, outlined the work necessary to be done by the institution and was followed by a report by Eiman Weiner, acting secretary at the camp, for the Board. H. A. Kaufman, chairman of the Tacoma committee, also made a report.

Lucius L. Solomons, of San Francisco, vice-president of the Constitution Grand Lodge and the Executive Committee of the B'nai Brith, questioned Rabbi Koch's authority to call the meeting, in view of the agreement between the Welfare Board and the B'nai B'rith, by which work at Camp Lewis was assigned to the latter organization. During the controversy, Rabbi Jonah B. Wise presided at the request of Rabbi Koch. After some discussion between the latter and Mr. Solomons, David N. Mosessohn, Grand President of District No. 4, of the B'nai B'rith, burst a bombshell into the conference by producing a telegram from Col. Cutler, as chairman of the Welfare Board, renewing the original agreement and giving the B'nai B'rith supervision over the welfare activities at Camp Lewis. However, he did not insist in behalf of the B'nai B'rith that they assume charge of the camp, but suggested a division of effort. That the Welfare Board take charge of the camp within and the B'nai B'rith will maintain and assume sole charge and jurisdiction over the activities outside the camp. Mr. Mosessohn, speaking with authority for the B'nai Brith, stated that the District will take charge of and maintain a proper building at Tacoma, as a recreation center for all men in U. S. uniforms, and that the B'nai B'rith would pay for its maintenance.

A resolution was then passed, that it was the sense of the conference that to District No. 4, I. O. B. B., should be assigned the sole maintenance and jurisdiction of welfare work outside the camp as outlined by Grand President Mosessohn.

Mr. Solomons maintained that although the B'nai B'rith by right and agreement could take over the supervision of the welfare work at Camp Lewis, that in view of the fact that the Welfare Board had already taken charge in having a paid secretary who had done some work, that District No. 4 of the B'nai B'rith would agree to a division of work by which the Welfare Board committee could continue its work within the camp, and the B'nai B'rith retain exclusive jurisdiction outside the camp, both institutions co-operating with each other.

Others took part in the discussion, practically all the Tacomans present being very strongly in favor of the B'nai B'rith assuming charge of the entire work.

The entire matter was finally amicably settled by the passing by unanimous vote of a motion by H. A. Kaufman, of Tacoma, by which the two bodies were assigned the work as above outlined.

The building in Tacoma will be maintained under B'nai B'rith auspices, the Tacoma Lodge and Ladies' Auxiliary membership acting as representatives of the entire District.

Written for the B'nai B'rith News

We all have learned the biblical lists of the twelve tribes. Some of us may be able to rehearse their names without recourse to the book. Still the majority appear to us nondescript, as devoid of individuality. The ten tribes we are in the habit of lumping together, the ten lost tribes to which we are fond of tracing any and every people or tribe, from the English down to the American Indian. Lost? Nothing is lost in this world. Somebody has said that the Phoenicians had the good sense of losing themselves and thereby sparing mankind another problem, the Phoenician, and in the same breath he adds, that as a matter of fact they were not lost, their blood courses in many a descendant, only they are nameless. There is the point, lost means nameless. The ten tribes were lost in as far as they suffered themselves to be merged with others. And they were merged because they lacked something to differentiate them from the others. Perhaps they were the internationals of those days who believed that nothing mattered for the welfare of the individual under what name he went so long as he existed and had his bread to eat and his garments to wear. But man liveth not by bread alone. That lesson they apparently had not learned. Nor the other, that the international merely betrays his own nation to become the member of another. For a nationless humanity does not exist. The other two tribes (principally it was one tribe) believed in nationhood, and so it survived the ages. Still it shares its renown with two others, and beside Judah we read and know much about two others, Levi and Joseph.

It has long been recognized that tribal ancestors are the children of their descendants. No tribe carries its traditions to the very beginnings. These beginnings are lost in the mist of that which lies back of all history, and the bridge connecting the present with the hoary past is a mental construction, unsafe to travel by. Levi, Joseph, and Judah may and may not have been real persons. But the fictions of genealogists are one thing, and the reality of tribal genesis quite another. Tribes are constituted not through birth alone but largely through integration, through the reception of all sorts of human material. A tribe is a nation or state in embryonic character. But when consolidated, a tribe loves to look upon itself as a family united by the tie of blood. There was indeed an old tribe of Levi. But that was disbanded at an early time. Catastrophes overwhelm tribes as they do nations. Simeon was another such tribe. They were both divided and scattered among the rest of the tribes. Levi made a virtue out of necessity. The scattered members knew themselves as a tribe in the ideal, not in the real; for the real mark of a tribe was territorial possession, and the Levites had no possession in the land, the Lord was their possession. They were the inter-tribals of ancient Israel. Their special avocation was to minister at the sanctuaries. Now such ministers were recruited from all classes and tribes, but ideally they knew themselves as one. It is true, the real Levite recognized not the ties of blood. Mastery of the ritual was the test of the Levite. The Levite is with us to this day. I am not referring to the Levis with or without disguise and their offshoot, the Cohens. Every rabbi who teaches the law and advises the people as to what may be eaten and what may not be eaten, guide of the individual conscience in matters pertaining to God, is a Levite in spirit. Every modern preacher in black cloth and white cravatte is a successor to the Levite. They all share with the Levite the same point of view. They have charge of the sanctuary, be it Temple or synagogue or again temple. They represent the Jewish Church. They are ecclesiastics. Much as you may say that the Jew recognizes no distinction between layman and priest, they are those who alone read prayers or expound the Scriptures. Much again as they may declaim against priest-dominion, their ideal is theocratic, which means the rule of God but in reality the rule of His vicegerents on earth. They look askance upon the political manifestations in the people. They prefer the foreign overlord. They choose the dispersion. Their interests are centered in the house of study whether at Jabneh or Breslau. And let me say that Levi will persist to the end of days. He will be a necessity on the hills of restored Zion as much as on the hills of Rome or of Cincinnati.

Joseph and Judah represent the political element in the Jewish people, the national. Joseph rose to preeminence sooner than Judah. The former was the aristocrat, the latter the upstart. Read the story of David as compared with that of Saul. Joseph was of the north. He learned the art of politics early. He dreamed to live in peace with his neighbors. He was more tolerant. Ahab pleased himself in the role of Palestinian statesman. He dreamed of a Palestinian world power of the same pattern as the other great powers of the day. He multiplied temples, but also fortified cities. His was a military state, and the soldiery made and unmade kings. But Joseph the statesman reckoned not with the character of the people. The prophets arose as the disturbers of Israel. It is they who undermined the northern state. They were radical extremists who grew out of the people and re-echoed the longings of the common people. They disdained riches and luxury and a civilization resting on oppression. Those in power looked upon them as fanatics, as dreamers, which they were. The prophets held up the ideals of an ancient nomadic life. Their utopias were unworkable as those of any modern extremist or nihilist. In their effort to bring back the good olden times they paved the way for the new order of things. But the one who harvested where the prophet had sown was the priest. It was too late to save Israel. The wound of Joseph was incurable, and he went into exile. Only mere debris of Israel remained. They reconstituted themselves later on as Samaritans, holding aloof from their southerly neighbor. And to this day a few hundred souls in Nablus are all that is left of ancient Israel, of Joseph. It is significant that their priests trace their genealogy to Aaron. Even that small community is dominated by Levi.

Judah alone took the prophetic lesson to its heart. In the hoary past Judah was a nonentity. The Song of Deborah knows nothing of him. He rose to prominence with and through David. David made Judah and the Jew and Judaism for all times to come. David's imperial dreams were realized indeed, but they were short-lived. Yet the splendor of that achievement became rooted in the consciousness of the people. He became the ideal of subsequent times. Around his person clustered all the hopes of the remnant of Judah. He was the one who would come back. And if not in person, then through his descendants, aye, through the one descendant of his who was to restore the ancient glory, conceived in national form. Messianism, as I view it, is Davidic, Judean. It is at once political and religious, though not priestly. David was sagacious enough to hold the priest in check. The house of God in Jerusalem which he was to build was a royal temple and the priest ministered there at the King's behest. It is the principle that the secular civil government is superior to the churchly. The law which is Levitical ignores the Messiah. To the priest Ezekiel the prince was there to defray the expenses of the temple worship, a sort of chief parnas. The priest repaid the Messianist in kind. If the Messianist was always an ill-disguised enemy of the law (anti-nomian), Messianism was curbed by the priest. Haggai was a Messianist pure and simple: Zerubbabel was to be invested with the royal dignity. Zachariah was a man of compromise: he had two crowns in readiness, one for the king and one for the priest. In the sequel the priest remained in sole authority. Simon the high-priest was the ideal of Sirach. There was no room for a rival authority. Jewish life was to be concentrated in the temple and in the law. And when the Maccabees usurped both dignities, the dissatisfaction was general. The priests would throw Messianism overboard. They put up a Messiah of their own, a Messiah of the seed of Aaron. But the people instinctively held to the Messiah of the seed royal, of the seed of David. The Jewish people was not ready to lose itself in a Church. For the Church is universal, a nation can only be itself and nothing else. Levitical orthodoxy might curb the Messianic stirrings and hold them in check. But the masses would not yield what they instinctively and elementally feel to be the strongest factor in their life. The hope of national restoration lives in them. The spiritual father of Zionism is none other than Maimonides, who seized upon a saying of the rabbis that the Messianic hope was essentially a political one. Let no one mislead us into believing two false positions. The one is that political Zionism is a break with Messianism. A break it is with the priestly Levitical Messianism which was surrounded with so much of the miraculous that its execution along the lines of reality was an impossibility. And the second point is that the ancient prophecies are said to have been fulfilled in the past. The Christians say the same. They all have the Levitical point of view. No prophecy is rooted in the subconsciousness of the Jewish people. Down deep in our soul slumbers the conviction that Judah shall prevail over Levi. Not that Levi shall be banished. No nation begins its life with a clean slate. The zealous watchers are already here to see to it that not a jot or tittle of the law and the codes shall perish. We may leave it to life to regulate things in the new Judea. It is a question only of subordination. The national ideal is supreme. The remnants of Joseph may choose to be re-united with us. The Levite shall be a welcome "stranger" in our gates. But the scepter of Judah shall not depart.

Assisted by the following artists: Renee Schieber, soprano; Dolphine Marsh, contralto; Harry Burleigh, Basso; B. Fromenson, tenor, and G. H. Faderlein, Organist.

There were about three thousand soldier boys present in the auditorium of the Y. M. C. A. at which the services were held. A great many of the audience were Gentiles and on the platform there were Mr. A. Hirsch, head worker of the Y. M. C. A. and Mr. M. Flynn, head worker of the Knights of Columbus.

As the boys left, they were each presented with cigars and cigarettes as a Chanukah present. These gifts, of course, were presented to all who attended, both Jew and Gentile.

SASKATOON, SASK.

Bro. M. Goorevitch, one of the leading Jews of the community and prominent member of the lodge, died on Dec. 15, 1917. Bro. Goorevitch was a man imbued with the highest standards of ethics, a friend in need to everybody, a member of all Jewish organizations and served for many years as president and vice-president of the synagogue.

At the meeting of the lodge held on Dec. 16, the regular order of business was dispensed with and memorial service was held in honor of Brother Goorevitch. The meeting was largely attended and a great number of visitors were present. The services were conducted by the president of the lodge, and at its conclusion suitable resolutions of condolence were adopted.

The open meeting was thereupon adjourned and the brethren present went into regular lodge session. At the regular meeting of the lodge it was resolved that all members of the lodge engaged in mercantile business keep their stores closed on the day of the funeral as a token of esteem to the late Bro. Goorevitch. It was also resolved that the members of the lodge in a body attend the funeral.

As agreed at the lodge meeting, the members of the Order assembled at the synagogue on the day of the funeral and were joined by a large number of non-members. All Jewish stores, even those of non-members of the lodge followed the request of the lodge and kept their stores closed during the time the body was conveyed to its last resting place.

The lodge and the Chevra Kadisha were in charge of the funeral services.

REVIEW OF YEAR BOOK, VOL. 2[illegible] C. C. A. R.

The twenty seventh volume [illegible] Yearbook of the Central Confe[illegible] American Rabbis, has just [illegible] from the press. It contains the [illegible] of the proceedings of the Buff[illegible] vention and the papers read [illegible] meeting.

The report of the president shows that the conference is becoming more and more a potent factor in national Jewish affairs and is being looked to by the laymen for direction and guidance. Many of the principal activities of their organizations today we originated by the conference and then given over to organizations whose facilities showed them better equipped to carry on the work.

Among the reports of special interest is the report of the Committee on Model Constitution, which is entrusted with the task of drawing up a model constitution for the guidance of congregations; the report of the Committee on Religious Work in Universities which is endeavoring to interest our growing young men and it is to be hoped our young women also, with an interest in Judiasm, and particularly the report of the Commission on Synagogue Pension Fund, whose purpose is to raise, with the assistance of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, a pension fund for superannuated ministers and teachers.

The discussions on the Jewish Congress and on Nationalism fill many pages of the volume.

Among the papers presented a scholarly study of Freedom of the Will, by Rabbi Louis L. Mann and a paper on Love, Human and Divine, by Rabbi Samuel S. Cohon, deserve special mention.

A timely paper on Heinrich Graetz, by Rabbi Gotthard Deutsch, and an appreciation of James K. Gutheim, by Rabbi Max Heller, fittingly marked the centenary of these two names, prominent in the Judaism of the nineteenth century.

An excellent paper by Rabbi Samuel Koch on Practical Problems of the Ministry, will find many readers among laymen as well as rabbis. The report and correspondence connected with the services held on the Mexican border for the Jewish soldiers in the fall of 1916 have been added for their historic value and interest.

The volume was edited by Rabbi Isaac E. Marcuson, of Terre Haute, Ind.

ROUMANIAN AMBASSADOR PROMISES EQUAL RIGHTS TO ROUMANIAN JEWS

Receives Committee of American Union of Roumanian Jews and Promises to Use His Good Offices to the End That the Jews in Roumania Should Be Emancipated.

A committee of the American Union of Roumanian Jews, consisting of Dr. P. Siegelstein, Leo Wolfson, L. Kalman, Dr. Braunstein, Edward Herbert, Sam Schwartz and Dr. Greenberg, were received in audience by Dr. Constantine Angelasco, the new Roumanian ambassador to the United States. The representatives of the Roumanian Jews of America spent more than an hour's time with the ambassador, discussing with him the Jewish question in Roumania.

Dr. Angelasco assured the committee that the Jews of Roumania would receive complete emancipation, and he also promised to do everything in his power to influence his government to that end.

The Roumanian ambassador asked the support of the American Union of Roumanian Jews in behalf of Roumania. He expressed himself very warmly in favor of the cause of the Roumanian Jews.

The committee was most favorably impressed with the words of the ambassador and favorable results are expected. After the audience the ambassador and the members of his commission had dinner with the committee at Hotel Shorehan.

JEWISH JUDGES IN POLAND.

The administrators of Poland have appointed a number of Jews to fill judicial posts in connection with the establishment of the new Courts of Justice. All were chosen from among the Assimilators; the Zionists and Nationalists were ignored by the authorities. Among those appointed are MM. Poznarsky and Rundstein to be Judges of the Court of Cassation; MM. Mandzin and Dickstein, Assistant Public Prosecutors; MM. Per, Sterling, and Lichtenfeld, Judges at Warsaw; MM. Cohen and Kempner, Judges at Lodz; MM. Bekerman, Hilsberg, and Kahan, Justices at Radom, Lublin, and Petrokoff respectively. A number of Jews were also appointed secretaries and assistant secretaries of Courts of Justice.

FOOD CONTROL IN A NUTSHELL

Speaking at a meeting of state food commissioners and his personal staff, Mr. Hoover gave a striking explanation of the part food control plays in war.

He said European nations went into the war giving little thought to the subject of food. Even Germany with all its preparations had not foreseen the significance of this factor. With millions of men taken from production and thousands of square miles of fertile fields laid waste by armies, the world's cupboard quickly began to develop a bareness like that of Mother Hubbard. Country after country went to the cupboard to get a bone and found a diminished supply.

This made it necessary to organize food supply and distribution, and the various countries tried various methods. They fixe maximum prices and minimum prices, regulated the production and distribution trades, and put their people on rations. Those countries which established the earliest and best methods of food control secured the greatest efficiency in war. The best system, on the whole, is still that of Germany, and she has been able to maintain efficiency with a food supply which in some of her enemy countries might be most embarrassing. Russia, with perhaps the greatest possibilities of food production in Europe, did nothing at all, and out of Russia's food situation grew her revolution.

Whether we like it or not, we must deal with the food problem of war in one of two ways. There is not enough food to go around if we stick to the lavish methods of peace times. Rising prices, coupled with depreciation of money due to issues of war bonds in every country, which makes the purchasing power of money shrink, compel us to adjust the food supply to the world's appetite, either by controlling that supply in ways that lead to economy and make it suffice, or by letting wages rise as prices rise, to keep pace roughly with fluctuations. Even an amateur economist can see at a glance that food control is better than wage increase, because wage increase is a crude force operating slowly, unevenly and with great injustice and suffering to millions of workers since the wages of many workers (such as professional men, clerks, municipal employes and others) do not always rise as prices go up.

Therefore, whether we like it or not—(this is a favorite phrase of the Food Administrator, and typifies the impersonal attitude he takes toward these great economic problems)—whether we like it or not, we must meet the food situation in one way or the other, and food control seems to be the lesser of two evils.

This viewpoint explains most of the work thus far done by the United States Food Administration. From Aug. 10, when President Wilson signed the food law, until today, much of the work of the Food Administration has centered upon the organization of food control machinery. The farmer, the grain man, the miller, the baker, the packer, the grocer, the wholesaler and retailer, the traveling salesman and the canned goods broker, have gone to Washington in bodies representing the best men and the best minds in their respective trades, and have conferred there, not only with the Food Administrator himself, but with leading men in their own lines who are acting as volunteers on the Food Administration. Sometimes they have gone with fear in their hearts, or resentment at the prospect of government interference in their business affairs. But there is a spirit in Washington which quickly dissipates fear and resentment and leads these men to offer their unanimous support to food control measures.

"Whether we like it or not", they are told, "this is the situation. Business cannot go on as usual in war times because the law of supply and demand is thrown out of operation. These are the conditions and here is the only remedy that has been found in countries with greater experience in war than we have yet had. What do you think about it, gentlemen"?

What the business men think is shown in every case by their action in recognizing the necessity for food control. They have promised their patriotic co-operation and are readjusting their trade organization and methods for loyal support of Food Administration policies.

With sensible food control it is possible to handle the other two outstanding problems of food supply in war. One is increased production and the other is economical use of food. With stable prices, absence of speculation, and the temporary surrender of individual trade advantages, the farmer can have an assurance of prices ample enough to encourage larger planting and live stock raising. And by these same safeguards, thrown around the food supply, the consumer will be willing to economize in food and able to purchase the necessities of life at prices which are at least reasonable and, what is more important, will not suffer wild fluctuations.

This is food control in a nutshell. Whatever fear or hostility there may be in the country over food control arises entirely from misunderstanding of what control really means, why it is necessary and how it is being carried out. In no case does this feeling persist after real food control has been explained.

Your Part in Lowering Prices.

If you do not get reasonable prices from your retail grocer on canned corn, tomatoes and peas, ask him why not. Inform him that a statement was issued from Washington on Nov. 1 that the effect of the new licensing system of the Food Administration should be felt immediately in lower prices, in many stores, of the articles named above. Then read this to him:

"Many lines of canned goods were bought by dealers at low prices last spring on future contracts. These goods are now being delivered, the canning season being at an end. If dealers take only a reasonable margin of profit on these goods, the prices to the consumer should be correspondingly low. It is expected that goods which the wholesalers still have on hand and which were bought early will be sold on a lower margin under the licensing regulations than has prevailed up to the present, and also in accordance with voluntary assurances given by them to the Food Administration. The Food Administration is hopeful of the patriotic co-operation of retailers in this regard. At a meeting recently held in Washington, representatives of the retail grocery trade passed resolutions in which was included the following:

"'We pledge ourselves to the United States government not to sell any of the fundamental necessities at a margin of profit over the delivered cost to the merchant that will yield to him more than a reasonable living profit, irrespective of the market conditions at time of resale; and we pledge ourselves to urge other grocers, whether under the licensing plan or not, to the end that margins of profit by retail grocers throughout the country over the cost to them shall not be greater than prevails under normal conditions. We urge that each retail grocer act individually, and that he sell the staple foods at no greater profit than is reasonable in accordance with their cost, and his individual cost of doing business, as sanctioned by the United States Food Administration'".

This resolution had the support of the entire executive committee of the National Retail Grocers' Association, representatives of the principal state and local retail organizations, and of large systems of chain stores and many prominent independent retailers from Maine to California.

Tell him this is the Food Administration's statement. Every consumer has a right to put this matter up to the retail grocer, and ought to do it, in the interest of all. Public sentiment and community co-operation can greatly aid the Food Administration in its steady aim to lower the cost of the necessities of life. Do your part.

Why Sign the Food Conservation Card?

"Are you trying to insult me? You ask me to sign a pledge to do the very things that I have been trying to do for years. As if I needed the government at Washington to tell me how to run my kitchen and my table".

This was the indignant message delivered to a Food Conservation visitor when she called the attention of one woman to the requests to save food made of all American housewives by the United States Food Administration, and asked her to sign the pledge card and then fill out the weekly report card for two months.

Of course the visitor explained that the officers of the United States Food Administration realize that there are hundreds of thousands of housewives who have been handling food with scrupulous care, but that it is not the purpose to omit anyone in this nation-wide canvass for helpers for the food conservation program. They are sorely needed in the campaign to enlist others and give them an example of what should be done. No one can be spared. The need is too pressing, the danger of a shortage of food for our forces in the field and the forces of our allies is too great. If the war is to be won, if the world is to be made safe for democracy, the food supply must be conserved, and the women who already know how must help those who are ready to learn how.

When these things were explained to the careful housewife she was ready not only to promise to make weekly reports but to persuade others to follow her example.

Food Conservation and High Prices.

"Why doesn't the Food Administration bring down the high prices"? Well, ask another question—Why aren't there two million United States soldiers in France and Italy today, fighting at the front and driving the Huns on the run towards Berlin? Because both take time, thorough preparation, and in case of food prices much voluntary co-operation. But something is being done every day, and to lower the cost of living wherever it is possible is one of the prime aims of the Food Administration, which has already kept the prices of many staples from going much higher. Flour might easily have been twice its present price per barrel if the Food Administration had not established a fair price for wheat and limited flour millers' profits. Sugar would almost certainly have gone soaring if speculation had not been stopped.

Then, some prices have been lowered. Flour has fallen substantially below the August prices. Speculation in Cuban sugar has been stopped, saving an exorbitant price though not securing a sufficient supply. This temporary shortage would have meant a large advance in price had not the Food Administration secured a voluntary agreement from the producers of cane and beet sugar. Do not forget these facts, because beefsteak is out of reach, sugar still higher than one could wish and many have to live more largely on hope than they like to.

Remember also that the Food Administration has no direct control over the retail trade, save where it does an annual business of $100,000 or more. That explains why, when the price of beef at the packer's door was 14.5 cents a pound in October, as compared with 16 cents in July, the average price of round steak in 796 cities was 31 cents a pound against 27 cents in July, showing that while the wholesale price decreased the retail price increased. Public sentiment, community co-operation, must take that in hand.

How about a shortage of sugar, making it difficult in some places to get any? Well, the Food Administration long ago pointed out what was coming, and made the simple request that our people should save seven ounces a week per person, in order to give our allies what they must have and supply what we need ourselves. If this had been done, or should now be done, our ration of sugar per person per year would be 67 pounds, while the English have to be content with 26 anl the French and Italians with 12. Aren't we willing to share with those who are fighting for us, with the enemy on their territory?

CONFERENCE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF FRATERNAL AND FRATERNAL INSURANCE SOCIETIES

Representatives of fraternal and fraternal insurance societies met with Secretary McAdoo and representatives of the Treasury Department for a conference on Dec. 13, 1917, in the Auditorium of the Interior Department, Washington, D. C. The conference was unusually well attended. After the meeting was called to order and a preliminary talk was made by Mr. Franklin of the Treasury Department explaining the object of the conference, Secretary McAdoo was then introduced. For an hour he thrilled and enthused that audience in the most logical, sensible speech heard for many a day. There were no frills in any direction, but plain, good, common sense. He was applauded time and time again, and at the close each and every one stood up, applauded and sang "The Star Spangled Banner". A motion was then made—that we pledge our united support to the government and to the secretary—which was naturally carried with great applause. All delegates were invited to meet the President at 2 o'clock at the White House. Among those present was Bro. Simon Wolf of Washington, representative of Order at the capitol. Before adjournment he asked the privilege to say a word, which privilege was granted to him. He said, in part, as follows: "I said that I was the representative, by request of the President, Adolf Kraus of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, the oldest Jewish fraternal organization in the United States; that we unreservedly pledged our loyalty, devotion and financial aid to the government, and that we could be relied on for any and every request that could in reason be performed. That, born in Germany eighty-one years ago and over, resident in the United States for seventy years, having passed through the Civil War, intimate with the sainted Abraham Lincoln, I at no time in my career felt more optimistic as to the final result than now, although the clouds were as dark as they were on the 26th day of June, 1863, after the battle of Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville had been lost, after Lee had been marching into Pennsylvania, yet as Gettysburg came, so in this great and unjustifiable war, our enemies would find their final Appotomax; that Lincoln had said to me that the clouds were dark, but the sun shone behind them and would emerge to bless and cheer each and every American".

In conclusion he said, "Washington had his Torries, Lincoln his Copperheads, Wilson his LaFollette and Pacifists, but as Washington and Lincoln came out victorious, so will our great and patriotic President".

The principal object of the conference was to enlighten and encourage the fraternal organizations to be a help in floating the bonds and to encourage other financial projects that will help support the government, and to deprive ourselves of things which are unnecessary, provided such deprivation can strengthen the aims and objects that we have to win the war.

Following was the program of the day's conference:

THE BLOOD LIBEL.

The large Jewish Community of Mohileff has spent many anxious days. True to their usual tactics, the Black Hundreds used to their advantage the disappearance of a three-year-old boy, the son of a Colonel, in order to renew the ritual libel charge. Happily, when the situation was very threatening, the boy was found unhurt and the innocence of the Jews was thus proved. Unfortunately the anti-Semites declined to lay down their arms, and the next weapon they introduced into the struggle was the tale of food-storing by Jews.

THE PSALMISTS
(PART II)

Ninth Essay in the Series of Historical Portraits of Jewish Leaders, by Rabbi Samuel S. Cohon, Chicago

Poets of many nations looked for God in the dazzling splendor of external nature: in the luminous arch of heaven, in the magic hues of the rising and setting suns, and in the majesty of the angry breakers of the sea. The singers of Israel saw the eternal Lord of heaven and earth, in the heights and in the depths, in the ordinary as well as in the extraordinary manifestations of nature. They heard the myriad voiced proclamation of the majesty of the great King:

The heavens declare the glory of God,
And the firmament showeth His handiwork;
Day unto day uttereth speech,
And night unto night revealeth knowledge;
There is no speech and there are no words,
Neither is their voice heard.
Their line is gone out through all the earth,
And their words to the end of the world.
(Psalm XIX:2-5b).

In the whole and in every detail, nature is a magnificent symbol of God. The light is His garment; the heavens are His curtains, the clouds His chariot; the winds His messengers; the flaming fires His ministers. He rides upon the wings of dawn, rolls the planets into their courses, and kindles the light of the sun and stars. He establishes the earth upon its foundations that it should not be moved forever. He looks upon the earth and it trembles; He touches the mountains and they smoke (CIV). The Psalmist declares:

Thine are the heavens, Thine also the earth;
The world and the fulness thereof, Thou hast founded them.
The North and the South, Thou hast created them;
Tabor and Hermon rejoice in Thy name.
Thine is an arm with might;
Strong is Thy hand, and exalted is Thy right hand.
Righteousness and justice are the foundation of Thy throne;
Mercy and truth go before Thee.
(Psalm LXXXIX:12-15).

The world is but the visible manifestation of Divinity. God is the Rock of Ages upon whom all creation rests.

But Thou, O Lord, sittest enthroned forever;
And Thy name is unto all generations.
Of old Thou didst lay the foundation of the earth;
And the heavens are the work of Thy hands.
They shall perish, but Thou shalt endure;
Yea, all of them shall wax old like a garment;
As a vesture, shalt Thou change them, and they shall pass away;
But Thou are the selfsame,
And Thy years shall have no end.
(Psalm CII:13, 26-28).

The assurance that God is from everlasting to everlasting, and that no place is devoid of His presence, fills the human heart with solemnity and with joy. Filled with awe, the Psalmist cries out:

Whither shall I go from Thy spirit?
Or whither shall I flee from Thy presence?
If I ascend up into heaven, Thou art there;
If I make my bed in the netherworld, behold Thou art there.
If I take the wings of the morning
And dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea;
Even there would Thy hand lead me,
And Thy right hand would hold me.
And if I say: "Surely the darkness shall envelop me,
And the light about me shall be night";
Even the darkness is not too dark for Thee,
But the night shineth as the day;
And the darkness is even as the light.
For Thou hast made my reins;
Thou hast knit me together in my mother's womb.
I will give thanks unto Thee, for I am fearfully and wonderfully made;

Wonderful are Thy works;
And that my soul knoweth right well.
My frame was not hidden from Thee,
When I was made in secret,
And curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth.
Thine eyes did see mine unformed substance,
And in Thy book they are all written—
Even the days that were fashioned,
When as yet there was none of them.
How weighty also are Thy thoughts unto me, O God!
How great is the sum of them!
(Psalm CXXXIX:7-17).

The conviction that God though dwelling on high, looks down upon earth's creatures, awakens the sense of dignity in the human heart, and raises man from the position of an abject slave of nature to that of a proud prince and ruler.

When I behold Thy heavens, the work of Thy fingers,
The moon and the stars which Thou hast established;
What is man, that Thou art mindful of him?
And the son of man, that Thou thinkest of him?
Yet Thou hast made him but little lower than the angels,
And hast crowned him with glory and honor,
Thou hast made him to have dominion over the works of Thy hands.

Thou hast put all things under his feet;
Sheep and oxen, all of them,
Yea, and the beasts of the field;
The fowl of the air and fish of the sea;
Whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas.
O Lord, our God,
How glorious is Thy name in all the earth.
(Psalms VIII:4-end.)

What distinguishes the nature poetry of the Psalmists from that of non-Jewish poets is the recognition that nature acts with a purpose. Nature develops, grows, and changes, in obedience to the will of Him who called it into being. He establishes order throughout the universe and in the life of man.

He loveth righteousness and justice;
The earth is full of the loving kindness of the Lord.
(Psalms XXXIII:5.)

For righteousness and justice are the foundation of His throne; Mercy and truth go before Him. (Ps. LXXXIX:16.) God is not a blind energy that throbs all through nature, but rather a conscious spiritual power.

He that planted the ear, shall He not hear?
He that formed the eye, shall He not see?
He that instructeth nations, shall not He correct,
Even He that teacheth man knowledge?
(Psalms XCIV:9-10.)

The Lord looketh from heaven;
He beholdeth all the sons of men;
From the place of His habitation, He looketh intently
Upon all the inhabitants of the earth;
He that fashioneth the hearts of them all,
That considereth all their doings—
Behold, the eye of the Lord is toward them that fear Him, Toward them that wait for His mercy.
(Psalms XXXIII:13-15, 18.)

The Creator and Ruler of nature is also the loving Father and Guide of mankind.

The Lord is full of compassion and gracious,
Slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy,
He will not always contend;
Neither will He keep His anger forever.
He hath not dealt with us after our sins,
Nor requitted us according to our iniquities.
For as the heaven is high above the earth,
So great is His mercy towards them that fear Him.
As far as the East is from the West,
So far hath He removed our transgressions from us.
Like as a father hath compassion upon his children,
So hath the Lord compassion upon them that fear Him.
For He knoweth our frame;
He remembereth that we are dust.
As for man, his days are as grass;
As a flower of the field so he flourisheth;
For the wind passeth over it, and it is gone;
And the place thereof knoweth it no more.
But the mercy of the Lord is from everlasting to everlasting to them that fear Him,
And his righteousness unto children's children;
To such as keep His covenant,
And to those that remember His precepts to do them.
(Psalms CIII:8-18.)

God is the source of man's strength. with Him, this child of dust is a mighty giant, defying dangers and trampling down obstacles.

I will say of the Lord who is my refuge and my fortress,
My God in whom I trust,
That He will deliver Thee from the snare of the fowler,
And from the noisome pestilence.
He will cover thee with His pinions,
And under His wings shalt thou take refuge;
His truth is a shield and a buckler.
Thou shalt not be afraid of the terror by night,
Nor of the arrow that flieth by day;
Of the pestilence that walketh in darkness,
Nor of the destruction that wasteth at noonday.
A thousand may fall at thy side,
And ten thousand at thy right hand;
It shall not come nigh thee.
Only with thine eyes shalt thou behold,
And see the recompense of the wicked.
For thou hast made the Lord, who is my refuge,
Even the Most High, thy habitation.
There shall no evil befall thee,
Neither shall any plague come nigh thy tent,
For He will give His angels charge over thee,
To keep thee in all thy ways.
They shall bear thee upon their hands,
Lest thou dash thy foot against a stone.
(Psalms XCI:2-12.)

The belief in God's unfailing care for man found expression in the twenty-third Psalm, which because of its simple faith, sweet spirit, and unaffected artless charms, has appealed to many people as the noblest lyric ever written. In Palestine, a country essentially pastoral, the whole tone of life took on a pastoral form. The patriarchs, kings, priests, and prophets, are spoken of as shepherds. In the language of the country, the relation between God and man came to be described as that of the Shepherd and His flock. Thus the Psalmist sings:

The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want,
He maketh me to lie down in green pastures;
He leadeth me beside the still waters.
He restoreth my soul;
He guideth me in the straight paths, for His name's sake.
Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death,
I will fear no evil,
For Thou art with me;
Thy rod and Thy staff, they comfort me.
Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies;
Thou hast annointed my head with oil; my cup runneth over.
Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life;
And I shall dwell in the house of the Lord forever.

Conscious of God's love and compassion, the Psalmists know no greater happiness for man than the drawing near unto Him, and standing in close personal communion with Him, to delight in His joy and salvation. In perplexity about the confusion of the order of things, the Psalmist cries out:

Nevertheless I am continually with Thee;
Thou holdest my right hand.
Thou wilt guide me with Thy counsel,
And afterward receive me with glory.
Whom have I in heaven but Thee?
And beside Thee, I desire none upon earth.
My flesh and my heart faileth;
But God is the rock of my heart and my portion forever.
For, lo, they that go far from Thee shall perish;
Thou dost destroy all them that go astray from Thee.
But as for me, the nearness of God is my good;
I have made the Lord God my refuge,
That I may tell all Thy works.
(Psalms LXXIII:23-28.)

For the Lord God is a sun and a shield:
The Lord giveth grace and glory:
No good will He withhold from them that walk uprightly.
(Psalms LXXXIV:12.)

The Psalmists found God in nature and in the moral law. Hence they took special delight in the study of His word as revealed in the Torah. (Psalms XIX: 8-12 and B. C. XIX.) Institutional religion was to them not a hindrance but an indispensable aid to spiritual communion with God.

As the hart panteth after the water brooks,
So panteth my soul after Thee, O God!
My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God;
"When shall I come and appear before God?"
My tears have been my food day and night,
While they say unto me all the day: "Where is thy God?"
These things I remember, and pour out my soul within me,
How I passed on with the throng. and led them to the house of God,
With the voice of joy and praise, a multitude keeping holiday.
Why art thou cast down, O my soul?
And why moanest thou within me?
Hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise Him
For the salvation of His countenance.
O my God, my soul is cast down within me,
Therefore do I remember Thee from the land of Jordan,
And the Hermons, from the hill Mizar.
Deep calleth unto deep at the voice of Thy cataracts;
All Thy waves and Thy billows are gone over me.
By day the Lord will commend His loving kindness,
And in the night His song shall be with me,
Even a prayer unto the God of my life,
I will say unto God my Rock: "Why hast Thou forgotten me?
Why go I moaning under the oppression of the enemy?
As with a crushing in my bones, mine adversaries taunt me;
While they say unto me all the day: "Where is they God"?
Why art thou cast down, O my soul:
And why moanest thou within me?
Hope thou in God; for I shall yet praise Him,
The salvation of my countenance and my God.
(Psalms XLII.)

The religious soul, struggling with the shadows of scepticism, pleads:

O send out Thy light and Thy truth; let them lead me;
Let them bring me unto Thy holy mountain, and to Thy dwelling places;
Then will I go unto the altar of God, unto God my exceeding joy;
And praise Thee upon the harp, O God, my God.
(Psalms XLIII:3-4.)

The spirit of these verses pervades the whole Psalter. In their quest after God, the Psalmists delight in the Temple worship, and find consolation in the art of its ritual. However, it is not the external side of the worship alone that attracts them. Over and above the sacrificial ritual, the festal pilgrimages, and the processions of the priests and Temple choristers, the Psalmists sound forth the jubilant strains of song, expressing their trust in God and their undying love for Him. Their "many toned voice of prayer" is raised now in confession and now in meditation; now in supplication and now in thanksgiving, ever holding in the forefront the prophetic insistence that God demands of men, not the sacrifices of bullocks and fatted rams but of righteousness, not material thank-offerings as much as the grateful spirit. The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; a broken and a contrite heart, O God, Thou wilt not despise". (Psalms LI:19.) The ceremonial sides of worship, of sacrifice, penitence, fasting, and prayer, are but the means for curbing man's rebellious spirit, and for purging it of the taint of sin and iniquity. The prayer of the religious man is:

Create in me a clean heart O God,
And renew a steadfast spirit within me.
Cast me not away from Thy presence;
And take not Thy holy spirit from me.
Restore unto me the joy of Thy salvation;
And let a willing spirit uphold me.
(Psalms LI:13-15.)

Before God, no earth-born creature can be pure. Sin rises as a barrier between man and God (LXVI:18; L:16 ff). To remove it, man must turn to God with whom there is mercy and plenteous redemption (CXXX:7), who alone can blot it out (LI:9; LXV:3-4).

Professor Cheyne has well observed that in places "Illusion born of sorrow impaired the purity of the idea of God. Instead of growing in all points into God's likeness, the Psalmists did sometimes as it were transform God into their own". (Origin of the Psalter, p. 386). Thus they occasionally ascribe to Him the human passions of wrath and vengeance, and call upon Him to crush their enemies. Their expressions of vindictiveness bear testimony to the all too common failing of even spiritually minded men to yield to the baser side of their natures, under the stress of personal or national misfortune. To their credit be it said that unlike religious savages in war times, the Psalmists do not call upon their followers to be their own avengers. In their indignation, they

By Our Correspondent Dr. M. Epstein

London, Dec. 16, 1917.

Sunday, the 2nd of December, will be a day famous, not alone in Anglo-Jewish History, but in the history of the Jewish people. On that day the Jews of London gathered together in solemn assembly to express their thanks to the British government for its declaration in favour of establishing in Palestine a National Home for the Jews. The occasion was one not to be easily forgotten. Let the reader picture a very large theatre, perhaps the most spacious in London. The house was full from roof to floor, and tier on tier you might see glad, eager faces in holiday mood. The platform was crowded, and Lord Rothschild sat in the middle as chairman of the gathering. To right and left there might be seen great statesmen, chief rabbis, distinguished people of all sorts and conditions. After a few opening remarks by Lord Rothschild, Lord Robert Cecil, Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, spoke in the name of the cabinet, and the cheers with which he was greeted undoubtedly testified to the representative of the foreign office how grateful the Jews were. People stood up and waved and cheered with their utmost strength. The tall, slightly bent form of Lord Robert stood still for several minutes, and when he began to speak he set forth the ideals for which the Allies were fighting, ideals which included the establishment of small nationalities, of whom the Jews were one, to work out their own salvation.

The second speaker was Mr. Herbert Samuel, who in the past had held many cabinet offices, including that of Home Secretary; and in the future, may rise to still greater heights. The audience gave a warm reception to the Jewish politician who confessed that in and out of the cabinet he had urged the claims of Palestine as a national home for the Jewish people. There were only three conditions which he attached to the scheme—that the rights of the Arabs should be recognized, that the Holy Places should be respected, and that Jews outside Palestine should continue to enjoy the full rights of citizenship in the countries in which they dwelt. The echoing cheers which greeted these statements sounded like a convincing "agreed"! This, indeed, was one of the motifs of all the speeches, and the Arab spokesman who addressed the meeting later, showed that there was little likelihood of disagreement about the first point. "O, ye sons of Abraham", he said, "remember the children of Ishmael". The appeal went home, it stirred ancient memories; it recalled the origin of a great race which had survived the onslaughts of time. Mr. Samuel's message also reached the heart; the greenest "Greener" could understand what he meant. Gradually he led up to the magnificence of the prospect, that while every Seder evening the Jew exclaimed "Next year in Jerusalem", perhaps the next Seder evening might make the wish a reality, and then he concluded—"Leshana haba bi-rushalayim". He brought down the house. It was like an electric shock calling forth innate enthusiasm and engendering more. Everyone felt that no matter what the other speakers might have to say, this was the speech of the evening. And the instinct was true.

Other speakers followed, reaching a high level. The Chief Rabbi, Mr. Hertz, recalled the parallel of Cyrus. "When the Lord turned again the captivity of Zion, then were we as in a dream". It was an apt illustration. Dr. Gaster, mingling oratory with passion, gave his tongue free rein, and the public trembled. Sir Mark Sykes, who knows the east intimately, who advised the British cabinet on eastern policies, who is the author of that magnificent, historic address to the Arabs when the British army captured Bagdad, who unites the idealism of the east with the practical politics of the west—Sir Mark Sykes delivered an address full of wisdom and sagacity, which recognized the possibilities of the new venture and did not overlook its difficulties. His appeal was so earnest, so sincere, so tinged with the highest and noblest motives, that it carried the audience away by its virility and sound common sense.

Mr. Zangwill, speaking as president of the Territorial Organization, declared that that body was ready and willing to join hands with the Zionists in the great work made possible by the British government's declaration. Needless to add, Zangwill received an ovation. He always does. Then came an Arab speaker, whose mother tongue sounded sweet to the ear. Why is it that Oriental languages were so musical? Would Hebrew sound like that when properly spoken? These two questions came to the mind again and again as one listened to Sheikh Ismail Abdual-akki. A translation soon furnished the gist of his sentiments, and they were gladly accepted by the audience. A representative of the Armenians also spoke.

Sir Mark Sykes had drawn attention to the possibilities that would ensue if Jew, Arab and Armenian worked together, co-operating in a friendly spirit while working out their own salvation. Mr. Ormsby-Gore in his address pointed out that it was noteworthy that representatives of the great creeds had all welcomed the object for which the meeting had been called. He was a churchman (i.e. a Protestant); Sir Mark Sykes was a Catholic; and he expressed his delight that the hope cherished for so many centuries should at last be nearing realization. If ever the Jews wanted a friend let them turn to him.

Though the London Opera House was packed with people, it was found necessary to arrange for an overflow meeting at a neighbouring theatre. There, too, crowds poured in from all parts of London to listen eagerly to the glad tidings and to join in the expressions of thanks to the British government, and when at the end, the Hatikvah was sung with its wonderful, yet hopeful cadences, even the non-Jew (and many were present) could not but be moved. The proceedings terminated with the National Anthem, and there was a heartiness about the singing that evidenced deep gratitude and hope realized. It was a great occasion.

Were all Jews there? Not all. It is a curious fact that what may be termed the Jewish circle wherein mix the scions of the ancient houses—these were absent. Like Ajax in the story, they are sulking in their tents. They object to the declaration of the British government; they will have none of Palestine; they are loud in their declaration that Britain is their country, a proposition that would seem not to need accentuation, seeing that all Jews who are British citizens can make the same claim. They appear to be frightened as well as vexed. So they have hastily set up a new body in Anglo-Jewry—the League of British Jews. The objects of the league are: (1) to uphold the status of British subjects professing the Jewish religion. (2) to resist the allegation that Jews constitute a separate political nationality. (3) to facilitate the settlement in Palestine of such Jews as may desire to make Palestine their home.

It is as well to face actualities, and the historian of passing events in Anglo-Jewry cannot hide from its readers that the Jewish community is threatened with disruption. It looks as though a split would divide the community into two camps. Of late years there has been an immense growth of democratic feeling and activity in Anglo-Jewry; the "Granddukes" have not been allowed to have it all their own way. Naturally those who held power, and who had held it for generations, made a fight for their rights. They were defeated, and the expression of that defeat was registered unmistakably at the recent clean sweep of the Board of Deputies. No oligarchy ever gave up power without a struggle, and the Anglo-Jewish oligarchy, and those who think with them, appear to be making a stand in the last ditch. It is difficult to see what they are afraid of. Some people assert that they are bent on saving their skin; others say that, having ridiculed Zionism all this time, they are afraid of being ridiculed themselves now if they should support it. But these explanations are hardly convincing. The League of British Jews cannot be concerned about its own skin because there is no bull on the horizon; while, on the other hand, far from averting ridicule, their league is likely to increase it. Yet, the people concerned are honest enough. They seem to be in a sort of dread terror, imagining that the foundations are being moved. Yet it does seem that if the war has not been fought in vain, if the world regains its senses and justifies itself as being a place for rational beings to dwell in, many of the ancient foundations will of a surety be swept away. Many new facts will have to be reckoned with, and why should not one be, the establishment of Palestine as the Jewish centre? That, if anything, would add pride to the Jew, especially if Palestine becomes a model commonwealth, as we hope it will. It is difficult to see how the establishment in Palestine of a National Home for the Jewish people can adversely affect the citizenship of the Jews outside Palestine. After all, Palestine will be able to contain only a fraction of the Jewish population of the world; the democracies of the British Empire, the United States and Russia will include by far the greater number of Jews.

Yet there is the fact. Anglo-Jewry has been split, and feeling in some quarters runs high. If bitterness of feeling is the test of a losing cause, then the people united in the League of British Jews must be very fearful of losing. It remains to be seen how events will develop. There is indeed a suggestion that both wings should confer with a view to compromise. A disunited community is a calamity. A disunited Jewish community is a special calamity. But a disunited Jewish community at the present juncture would be a curse. Possibly when feeling has died down and wisdom (on both side) comes into its own again, the two wings will work in harmony as before. It is curious to observe how the house of Rothschild, is itself divided on this question. Lord Rothschild, the head of the family, has identified himself with the Zionists, who may roughly be said to represent the democratic elements in Anglo-Jewry; Major Lionel de Rothschild, the cousin of his Lordship and head of the firm, is leading the Anti-Zionists, who may roughly be said to represent the aristocratic elements in Anglo-Jewry.

Amid the din of these local differences comes the great news that Jerusalem has been occupied by British troops. The whole world was moved at the event, which stirred the imagination of civilized mankind. What historic memories are associated with the place! The Jews, the Canaanites, the ancient empires of Assyria, Babylon, Egypt, Rome, the Crusaders, the Turkish domination; and now, to crown all, comes the British success. The press of all shades of political and religious opinion in this country has been deeply touched by the news; religious bodies have expressed gratitude to Almighty God for an event which is a landmark in the history of civilization. Jews too, were not slow with their deep thankfulness for this splendid Chanukah gift obtained by British arms. The Chief Rabbi sent an appropriate greeting of congratulation to the King; representatives of the Zionists called personally to congratulate the British cabinet; and yesterday in all synagogues in the United Kingdom, special prayers were read in commemoration of the great event. Dull must they be of soul who can remain unaffected; but, indeed, so far as one can judge, there was no one who was not affected. And the general hope seems to be that, come what may, whatever arrangements are arrived at after the war, Jerusalem and Palestine shall not be restored to the Turk.

Pleasing as is the news of the success of the British in Palestine, it must not be forgotten that it was not won without losses. These include a number of Jews, many of whom are fighting in the land of their fathers. Perhaps the most distinguished are two men in their prime, both of Jewish origin, the one completely, the other partially—Major Evelyn de Rothschild, younger son of the late Mr. Leopold de Rothschild, who died of wounds received in Palestine, and Captain Neil Primrose, son of Lord Rosebery, who was killed in action there. A relative of both has written so beautifully about them that her words are well worth reproducing. Here they are:

> "The two cousins and friends, who have fallen on the same battlefield in the Land of Palestine, have left fragrant memories behind them. To the one, the romance of the situation must have forcibly presented itself on that fatal morning when he knew that in company with the Bucks Hussars he was advancing towards the Holy City, the very spot where his ancestors had once worshiped in the Temple that had contained the Holy of Holies glorified by the Divine Presence. England, the land of civil and religious liberty, has for many a long day given a home to the Jews, who have repaid her hospitality by devoted and ungrudging service in many fields. And now a young and brave member of a Jewish family was to offer up the supreme sacrifice almost within sight of the old home of his race. Many orthodox members of the Jewish community have since time immemorial requested that at their death a little [illegible] the Holy Land should be p[illegible] their coffins, and this has re[illegible] been done. But this young [illegible] with his inheritance of fine a[illegible] qualities, with his love for h[illegible] his affection for his beautiful [illegible] home, and his readiness to [illegible] community as well as his country, was prepared to lay down his life on that very soil which his forefathers had wrested after many a long struggle from races whom we know but by their names. And it was that hallowed soil that received him as he fell. There also his cousin, to whom he was devotedly attached, gave his life for his country. Descended on his mother's side from the same Jewish family, he must likewise have experienced a romantic thrill in the advance".

There is another episode worth recording. There was a special memorial service to Neil Primrose on Nov. 26, at Westminster Abbey, and a special prayer was offered up to "God, the Lover of Men", beseeching "the remembrance of all those, the brave and the true, who have died the death of honour, and particularly Neil Primrose, and his relative and brother officer, Evelyn de Rothschild, who are uppermost in our minds at this time". Here was a Christian cathedral, a Christian service in memory of a Christian, and yet a Jew was included in the prayers! Bismarck once boasted of the young German lieutenant type that no country would imitate Germany in that! The boast was worthy of the boaster. One might vary the phrase and say in regard to this illustration of thoughtfulness, "Only in England—or shall we say in an English-speaking country—would this be possible".

NEW YORK KEHILLAH HOLDS SPECIAL CONVENTION.

Is Reorganized on Democratic Basis—Zionist Resolutions Adopted.

The special convention of the New York Kehillah, which was held on Sunday, Jan. 13, 1918, adopted a plan of reorganization which, when put into actual operation, will make the New York Kehillah genuinely democratic in its form of organization. In brief, the plan provides for the representation in the Kehillah, and for a voice in its management, of every individual Jew and Jewess in Greater New York.

According to this plan, the Kehillah will be the most representative body of the million and one-half Jews in Greater New York. New York Jewry is henceforth to be divided into eighteen Kehillah districts, of which three, one in the Borough of Richmond and two in the Borough of Queens, are to be known as suburban districts. Each district will have a special name, as, for example, Bronx Kehillah District, etc. Each Kehillah district is also to have a district assembly, which will be a local Kehillah, and all these eighteen local Kehillahs will be represented in the New York Kehillah.

The annual convention of the Kehillah will consist of 550 delegates, who will be selected as follows: Two hundred representing the individual members of the Kehillah, 200 delegates from synagogues, organizations and institutions, and 50 from orders, central organizations and delegates at large.

The price of membership in the Kehillah will be one dollar a year, which will also entitle the member to receive, free of charge, the yearly Kehillah Register and also the Monthly Kehillah Bulletin.

The reorganization plan was proposed by Dr. Sampson Benderly. The convention was called specifically for the purpose of considering this plan, and was to consist of the same delegates who had been elected to the regular convention last May, and also of delegates from newly affiliated organizations. Although about 430 delegates were to have been present, there were only about 150. Dr. J. L. Magnes, the chairman of the Kehillah, presided.

On motion of Mr. Joseph Barondess the following resolutions were adopted:

1. To express the gratitude of the Kehillah to the British government for its declaration favoring a Jewish homeland in Palestine.
2. To thank Italy and Servia for their friendly attitude towards the Zionist movement.
3. To call upon the members of the Kehillah and all the Jews in general to assist in bringing about the realization of the Zionist aims.

At the closing of the convention Dr. Magnes explained that the regular convention will be held in about three months and will be convened according to the provisions of the newly adopted plan of organization.

MINOR NATIONS AND MINORITIES AMONG NATIONS

We who are witnesses of the world war, aye, participants in the gigantic struggle, must be impressed with the truth of the parody, in times of war prepare for peace. For of the variety of the original adage, in times of peace prepare for war, there is no need of a discussion. Military scientists, who base their calculations upon experience, will be able to tell us just how many years of peace that is of preparation for war, are requisite before the furies of war may be let loose. And a corollary of the theorem will run to this effect, that nations which have failed to utilize the years of peace to make adequate preparations for war will be so much worse off than the harnished aggressor. For peace, as well as war, requires two parties to the bargain, and woe to the nation that mistakes surface tranquility for a deep and abiding peace. But what is novel to us who stand in middle life and have no recollection of the former wars at all commensurate with the present is that nations, while with one hand busy refurbishing and replenishing their weapons, with the other set about formulating their aims and objects, that is the conditions upon which they will contemplate peace. The ministries for foreign affairs are quite as busy as those immediately charged with the conduct of the war, and the same emissaries that sit at a strategic council and exchange views as to the next move for peace. The war may be protracted and last a good many years more; but it is recognized that peace must come at some time in the future, and against that day it is prudent to be prepared. Thus arise the formulas of which we have had many samples. Some are extremist, some are moderate; some are destined to obtain a hearing, and others will be relegated to the background. Among them there is one which stands out prominently and which will probably be fought over with all the resources of diplomatic ingenuity. It seems so simple, so convincingly true, that the smaller nations, those that have borne the brunt of aggression, need to be protected in the new order of things which the termination of the war will bring about. The great powers are capable of taking care of themselves; the minor nations will need the support of some one group of great powers to gain their point, which is, freedom from wanton aggression, and the right to occupy their territory and lead thereon their own life. Naturally it is not exactly a sense of fair play that will insure their existence. It is a matter of enlightened self-interest for the great powers to create between their own area and that of a formidable neighbor, a buffer state. And the safety of such a state rests solely upon the equilibrium of interests in the surrounding great powers. It is easy to enumerate those buffer states, and it is just as easy to foresee that nations hitherto unrecognized will rise to life and be placed on the same footing. A still newer thing is the recognition on the part of some statesmen that minorities lodged in nations small or great have a right to individual existence and should be protected against the levelling hand of the majority. We long ago learned the lesson that individuals may be outvoted but not submerged or subjected to the statue of rightless helots. That was the fruit of the French Revolution. Our own constitution safeguards the inalienable rights of individuals. But what we have still to learn is that the smaller aggregates consisting of individuals bound together by language, religion, history have an equal right to continue their traditions within the framework of history, have an equal right to continue their traditions within the framework of the state. The state in its modern form cannot be national in the sense of a homogeneity of racial ties or of cultural life. No one will dispute the rights of the majority, but the rights of minority must be equally acknowledged. Some states are more centralizing, others less so. Minorities must be ready for once and all to surrender political ambitions. Politically, the state must be one. But we are coming to learn that there are other sides to the life of an aggregate. There are cultures, modes of life which are not political, which constitute cherished individuality. Sometimes the historical traditions assume the form of religion. No one will gainsay religious tolerance. But sometimes, as in Poland, for instance, religion is bound up with a language, which ought not to be crushed. But even these minorities are not homogeneous; that is to say, they are not conterminous with a territory. Intermixed with them are still other minorities, minorities within the minorities. It is but just that they should be placed on a footing of parity. The state has by this time learned the lesson that the soul cannot be owned, governed, throttled. Folk souls are as real as individual souls. The varieties, the greater, and the lesser, it is that enrich the life in a political unit. A lasting peace on earth is possible when not only the great and independent nations shall live in amity, but also when aggregates within the state marked by ties of blood or history or faith shall be permitted to live at peace with the majority to which they willingly accede the dominating influence in the political life of the nation.

"LIKE UNTO THEM THAT DREAM"

The British occupation of the Holy City, consummated on the twenty-fifth day of Kislev, has thrilled both Jew and Christian. To the Christian the Turkish dominion over the Holy Land has for centuries been a thorn in the flesh. The glories and the romances and the trials of the Crusaders come to memory. This war has been no Crusade. It has been most secular, most unromantic. It is true, a Christian nation has unfurled its banner within the ancient city. But it did not start out to win back the mountains of Judea. It took them as a by-product of the war, certainly for eminent strategic reasons. A victory on any other line might have been much more valuable or decisive. But it is safe to say that no other victory could be as important. The British general and his entourage entered the city on foot. He realized that in the spot, where his Master spent his last days, it behooved him not to give free course to theatrical display. It was sacred ground. And so it was to the Christian. And so it certainly is to the Jew. It is true, so far the thanksgivings have resounded from Christian pulpits, where Psalms 126 and 122 were chanted, and among the Jews in the all too sober Zionist conventions and meetings. Yet let none say that the Jews have been apathetic. In certain circles the indifferences was assumed, cultivated, in deference to party watchwords. But something was nevertheless tugging at the heart of the Jew. Turkey was once quite friendly to the Jews. It received them when they fled Spain. But of late it has looked askance at Jewish infiltration; it has placed obstacles in the way of colonization. A Jew could not own land in Palestine. Turkish misgovernment is proverbial. The Ottomans would let no one else improve the land, and in their indolence and shortsightedness they suffered a rich country to look like a desert and made of the Holy City a by-word of tourists for uncleanliness. Now a new era has set in. For the opportunity that had been the Turk's has slipped out of his hand. Had he been far-sighted, he would have realized that Jewish thrift and Jewish industry were valuable assets, and that the Jewish colonies, if given free scope, would have proved a bulwark of the Ottoman empire. Misguided as they were, the Turks have had to relinquish their hold upon a city sacred to the two older faiths. It seems that at last the hour of redemption has struck. It came, and we are "like them that dream". Our rabbis long ago taught us that when the end comes it will be sudden, unexpected, barely realizable. Of course, what seems sudden may often be long prepared. There are no leaps in the realm of nature. And God, Nature's Master, has His designs well framed ahead. Wonderful, miraculous His doings may be, but they are so only to our human minds; nothing is too wonderful for God. Far be it from us to say that the times of the Messiah have come. We have no desire to wound any Jew's susceptibilities. Perhaps the Messianic doctrine is too sacred, too lofty, too much an ideal, ever to believe it fulfilled, realized to the utmost in the real which must fall short of the ideal. The orthodox may still go on waiting for the Messiah to come out of the clouds. A mere Jewish state in Palestine will not satisfy the radical who looks for the Messianic kingdom in a sort of universal brotherhood of nations. Perhaps the two are reconcilable. But the unsophisticated Jew will see in the occupation of Palestine, of Jerusalem, by British forces, coming as it did on the top of the British declaration in favor of a Jewish homeland, an earnest of the future, the beginning of the end. These are indeed extraordinary times. Much travail is awaiting us, much disappointment perhaps. The Russian revolution bids fair to be choked by its very friends of the extremist type; and much blood will be shed before Palestine will be in a safe place to venture into. But we are sure of our cause. We desire to live in peace with the world, whether we be of the large majority rooted in our various homes, or of the small minority that will choose to settle in Palestine. And the world will be the gainer when the spectre of the Jewish problem shall have vanished. As the United States is now at war American Jews cannot but wish success to it and the cause of its Allies. And that we do as Americans first and foremost. Specifically Jewish aims bid fair to be realized through one side or the other, for they are grounded in justice, justice to the individual Jew who willingly shares the burdens of his country, justice to such of the Jewish people which has never lost sight of the dream of restoration.

MRS. S. KISER.

Mrs. S. S. Kiser, wife of Solomon S. Kiser of Indianapolis, died suddenly on Dec. 16, 1917. Mrs. Kiser was known as a woman who for years had been active in community work in her city. She was a member of the executive committee of the Council of Jewish Women and vice-president of Temple Sisterhood. Mrs. Kiser devoted much of her time to beneficent and philanthropic activities irrespective of creed and was especially active in all Jewish communal affairs. The Jewish community of Indianapolis has lost a valiant worker. The B'nai B'rith News on its own behalf, as well as in the name of numerous friends of Mr. S. S. Kiser, extends to him their heartfelt sympathy in this hour of his affliction.

SOLOMON SULZBERGER.

Mr. Solomon Sulzberger, Treasurer of District Grand Lodge No. 1 and President of Temple Beth El of New York, died on Jan. 4, 1918. In his passing, Jewry of New York and the Order have lost one who was closely identified with everything pertaining to their welfare for more than a half century. Mr. Sulzberger was an earnest man, of lovable character, loyal to his religion and a willing worker for every Jewish cause. He was well acquainted with the founders of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith and soon became interested in their work. He joined Zion Lodge in 1859 and remained a member thereof until his death. His services to the Order were recognized by the various offices he held, including the Presidency of District Grand Lodge No. 1. He was recognized not only in his District, but also by the convention of the Order. For a number of years he was Honorary Secretary of the Order. In 1878 he was chosen Treasurer of his District; he retained the confidence of his brothers to such a degree that he was re-elected each year to that office and held it at the time of his death.

Mr. Sulzberger had a singularly pleasant personality, winning for him many friends. He was a good man, a faithful Jew, a loyal Ben B'rith and a good citizen.

SIGMUND SICHEL.

Mr. Sigmund Sichel of Portland, Ore., a prominent citizen and ardent Ben B'rith and communal worker, passed away on Monday morning, Dec. 10, 1917, after an illness of several months.

Mr. Sichel was easily one of the most beloved men in his home city, genial, kind and of a lovable disposition. He numbered his friends by the thousands. He came to Portland in 1873, direct from his birthplace in Germany. After spending six years in Portland, he moved to Goldendale, Wash., where he later became mayor. He returned to Portland in 1888 and immediately became active in public and communal affairs. He was a member of the Board of Governors of the Communal Trust, a trustee of the the Chamber of Commerce, a member of the executive board of the city in 1903, and police commissioner for three years. He served in the Oregon State Senate for four years, where he introduced remedial measures.

Mr. Sichel was affiliated with the B'nai B'rith and other fraternities. He was one of the first members of the American Jewish Committee. He was a member of Concordia Club, and for ten years president of the Congregation Beth Israel. He was vice-president of the first Hebrew Benevolent Society of Portland, president of the Society of Social Hygiene. Mr. Sichel was very active in charitable and philanthropic matters.

Mr. Sichel was especially beloved by the B'nai B'rith. He held at different times all the offices in the Grand Lodge, including that of President in the year 1900.

The death of Mr. Sichel is an irreparable loss, not only to the community in which he lived, but to the country at large and particularly to Jewry. He was a lover of mankind, always ready to help the distressed. Rabbi Jonah B. Wise, in speaking of him, said:

"Sigmund Sichel was zealous for the law. He followed in letter and spirit the maxims of Israel's guide. He was a laborer in the field. His firm hand set up the overthrown sheaves and guided the gleaner's steps. He shirked no task of humanity, loyalty and religion. In his death the Jewish as well as the general community lost a faithful, tried and needed man. A man of such tenderness is not soon replaced. Those who knew him want the niche he left made a place of memory, a blessing and an inspiration".

FELIX MOSCHELES DEAD.

Felix Moscheles, the painter, died at Tunbridge Wells, England, on Saturday, December 22. He was born in London, February 3, 1833, a son of Ignaz Moscheles, a composer, and godson of Felix Mendelssohn. His artistic education was received at Antwerp and Paris, where his early pictures were exhibited. He had been President of the International Arbitration and Peace Association, and also President of the London Esperanto Club.

JEWS AS ATHLETES.

Out of 17,000 boys at the Great Lakes Naval Training Station 47 have been selected as picked men to represent all forms of athletics. Nine of those seleted are Jews and seven of these nine are members of the Chicago Hebrew Institute.

B'NAI B'RITH WORK DURING THE WAR.

By Adolf Kraus, President of B'nai B'rith.

During the first year of the war, when something of the horror of it and the suffering caused by it became known, the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith raised a large sum of money and sent it to the countries of the allied nations and also to those of the central powers for the relief of the fleeing, destitute victims who, unhappily placed near the borderlands of the war, were the first to feel the devastating tread of the invading armies of first one belligerent and then another.

Now, since our own country is at war, it is bending its energies to make the lives of our own soldiers happier and to protect them against evil influences by establishing headquarters for them near the cantonments and camps, where they have the comforts of home, and by inviting them to the homes of the members of the fraternity, where they may have temporary relief from the hardships of camp and occasional touch with the refinements of home. This work has been fully approved by the War Department of our government.

Three years ago, in my message to our organization, in convention assembled, I said:

"My conception of the object and purposes of our great organization is that where our people most suffer, there lies our first duty. From our standpoint the suffering of our co-religionists anywhere in the world is not a foreign affair. The cause of Israel knows no such distinction. The breath of life to our order is service—service to others. If the time ever comes that the necessity of service to others shall have passed, well may that time also witness, not with sorrow, but with joy and love, the passing into history of an organization whose energies and labors were devoted to that end.

"But the fulfilling of Isaiah's prophecy is not yet at hand, when 'The wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard lie down with the kid'.

"Before that blissful time is reached there is much to do. The hammer of destiny striking the anvil of time is slowly fashioning the form and tempering the quality of human justice as God willed it to be. The Children of Israel have suffered long from the world's injustice. Perhaps behind it all the purpose lay to teach the world justice.

"But the dawn is breaking. The struggle has not been in vain. Hope sees in the far distance a glimmer of light. Gather together, all you strong men of Israel! Hold fast to the heights you have attained! Onward under the banner of service and justice and the victory is ours! Not victory midst the roar of artillery and the crash of battle. Not victory upon a field strewn with the fallen shapes and red with the blood of our fellow men; but victory through lifting up the lowly, victory through raising the fallen, victory through administering to the wounded and afflicted, victory through centuries of patient suffering for justice's sake, victory through the overcoming of hatred—the victory of an ideal"!

Since then great changes have taken place. It is not Israel alone who suffers, but all the world. This suffering cannot now be cured merely by lifting up the lowly, raising the fallen, administering to the wounded and afflicted, nor by patient suffering. A sterner duty now confronts us midst the roar of artillery and the crash of battle.

The greatest sacrifice which any people can make, the surrender of our children to the cruel fate of war, must now be made in order that liberty may not be drawn from the world and that peace and happiness among men be securely established on the face of the earth, not only for this generation, but for the generations to come. To this end no sacrifice is too great. This terrible war may be God's will, working to the fulfillment of Micah's prophecy:

"And He shall judge among many people, and rebuke strong nations afar off; and they shall beat their swords in plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.

"But they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree; and none shall make them afraid; for the mouth of the Lord of hosts hath spoken it".—Editorial, Chicago "Examiner".

It is a bad sign if a man despises his life; God will hold him accountable.—Talmud.

IN MEMORIAM

Edward L. Heinsheimer

By Faculty of Hebrew Union College, Convened in Special Session, Dec. 12, 1917.

The sudden death of Edward L. Heinsheimer in the prime of life has shocked and saddened us beyond all expression. Our beloved institution has lost a wise and unselfish leader and efficient and devoted executive. We are mindful of his twenty-five years of loyal and conscientious service as a member of the Board of Governors. Especially do we recall his last eight years, when, as president of the board, he gave to the college the fullest measure of his zeal and energy. Under his wise and watchful leadership, our college has advanced from strength to strength.

In his demise every member of our faculty has lost a true and tried friend, whose sympathy and support were always generous, and whose interest was a constant source of encouragement. His regular presence at the Sabbath afternoon service in the college chapel brought him into intimate contact with professors and students. He commanded our admiration and affection. His passing is for each one of us a keen personal bereavement.

Edward L. Heinsheimer was indeed an inspiration. He was a living witness to our conviction that Judaism, even while adapting itself to time and environment in all lands, and particularly in our beloved country, is certain to survive in all its essentials for the good of humanity. Liberal Judaism needs the encouragement such as our lamented leader has given by his enthusiastic devotion to everything Jewish. In him Judaism has lost a faithful and valuable servant.

To the grief-stricken family with whom we are united in sorrow, we extend our prayerful sympathy, bidding them to look up to Him who maketh sore and bindeth up. Who woundeth and Whose hands make whole. May they find comfort and strength in the trust and inspiration found in the words of our sages:

"The end of man is death whether it come early or in the fullness of years;
But, whatever be life's duration, its true measure is usefulness".

Blessed is he who has lived nobly, and, in departing leaves an honored name behind. Of such a one the Scripture says:

"A good name is better than precious oil,
And the day of death than the day of birth".

RESOLVED, that this expression of our respect and affection for Edward L. Heinsheimer be spread upon a separate page of our minute book and forthcoming catalog, be communicated to the Jewish Press of the country, and that an engrossed copy thereof be transmitted to the family of the deceased.

In behalf of the faculty,
DR. KAUFMAN KOHLER,
President.
HENRY ENGLANDER,
Registrar.

RESOLUTIONS.

The sages of old say that when a truly wise man dies not only the family but the whole community mourns. So in the death of

ADOLPH HERZ

Gan Eden Lodge has lost a true worker whose words of wisdom often guided and directed the councils of the lodge.

As when a sculptor tears away the scaffolding which has in part obscured the work and the beautiful figure stands in all its beauty before us, so death has presented to us the life of our departed friend and it stands out as a true monument which can well adorn in memory the halls of our lives.

ADOLPH HERZ

was a true Ben Brith, a "son of the covenant" of charity and brotherly feeling which has bound the Jew not only to the Jew but to mankind in the spirit of kindliness and friendship.

As his life has so well exemplified the teachings of this Order so shall it be to us an inspiration in the years to come to try in part at least to carry out some of the fine lessons which we learned from his association with us.

BE IT THEREFORE RESOLVED, that Gan Eden Lodge, I. O. B. B. record its deep sense of loss in the death of our friend and brother, Adolph Herz, by spreading this testimony to his worth upon our minutes and by draping the charter of the lodge for thirty days;

And BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED, that a copy of these resolutions shall be sent to the family of the departed brother with the assurance of our deepfelt sympathy in their sorrow.

Gifts were received from Mr. David J. Galter of Philadelphia, Dr. Harry Friedenwald of Baltimore, Dr. Israel Abrahams of Cambridge, England, New York Section Council of Jewish Women, and the Moody Bible Institute. The total number of volumes now in the Library is 18,058.

The Winter Term opened on January 7, 1918.

THE CHAOS IN RUSSIA.

So far there is no freedom, no right and no justice in Russia, especially as far as the Jews are concerned. The Russian people got rid of the Czar, but not of the Black Hundreds. To these evil forces, which under the autocratic rule of the Czar and his cruel government, have filled the life of the Russian Jews with tears and torments, the coming in power of the Bolsheviki has added many more dangers and menaces to our unfortunate brethren. Pogroms are the order of the day, and reports come from many Russian cities of Jewish business houses and Jewish homes being looted and of Jewish families being massacred. Soldiers, deserting the trenches, form groups of robbers and the Jews are their first victims. The Russian clergy is inciting the mushicks, the farmers, to kill the Jews and the monasteries are brimfull with such literature, which is being spread among the masses. A Jewish delegation, who asked Trotzky for protection, was given the answer that he is not a Jew but an internationalist and will do nothing for the Jews. He declared to them that the pogroms are the result of the despair of the Russian masses, who are suffering from the speculators and the rich, and the only way to fight against the pogroms is, in his opinion, to arrest the speculators and the rich. Many of the pogrom instigators are the Bolsheviki themselves, and still the cry is loud in Russia that most of the Bolsheviki are Jews. So the chaos in Russia grows and spreads and the Jews look tremblingly into the future, for God knows where all this disorder will end.

GERMAN MAJORITY SOCIALIST INDORSES ENGLAND'S PALESTINE DECLARATION.

A sensation has been caused in Germany, according to a cable to the Jewish Morning "Journal", by the publication of an article written by Herr Cohen-Reis, a member of the Reichstag and an adherent of the majority socialist party, advising Germany and Turkey to issue a declaration in favor of the establishment of a Jewish national homeland in Palestine along the lines of the famous British declaration, which he endorses in the strongest terms.

Herr Cohen-Reis pronounces the British declaration as a move of the greatest political wisdom. He deplores the lack of political foresight on the part of Germany and Turkey in permitting England to take the lead in the response to the Jewish demand, and even if they should both make the declaration, he proposes they will not now derive the greatest political advantage from such a course, as it will come too late to win the sympathy of the Jewish people for the cause of the Central Empires. But, at least, he points out, it will help to moderate the antagonism of the Jews in Russia, whose friendship, he declares, is of vital importance to the success of the present peace negotiations with Russia.

CENTRAL COMMITTEE FOR [illegible] RELIEF OF JEWS SUFF[illegible] THROUGH THE WAR

The Central Committee for [illegible] of Jews Suffering Through the [illegible] Chambers street, New York, [illegible] designated the week beginning [illegible] Jan. 27, 1918, and ending Feb. [illegible], 1918, as Mercy Week in honor of the second anniversary of Proclamation Day, on Jan. 27, 1916, which was named by President Wilson. The committee has issued the following appeal:

Sunday, Jan. 27, marks the second anniversary of the Jewish Relief Day designated by President Wilson in his historic proclamation as the day on which the people of the United States of America were asked to stretch out their helping hand to the millions of Jews suffering in the war zones.

This event was epoch making and must never be forgotten. As long as life lasts Jews will recall the noble action of the President of the United States of America. The Central Committee for the Relief of Jews Suffering Through the War, at whose instigation Proclamation Day was set on the 27th of January, 1916, feels that the anniversary should not be passed by without a concrete demonstration of the appreciation of President Wilson's high-minded response to the needs of our stricken brethren in the war zones.

We have now entered upon the fourth year of this terrible conflict—a struggle in which all the forces of humanity are arrayed against the powers that wreak evil and destruction. The reports that continue to come from "Over There" show that the suffering of our people is not only as intense as it has hitherto been, but is even greater. There is but one answer to be given, and that is to go on gathering contributions for the Relief Fund until all hunger is stilled, every naked body clothed and the sick healed. In other words, the work of saving the lives of men and women and of children must go on unchecked.

The Central Relief Committee appeals to all the communities and organizations co-operating with it to make Mercy Week a record in the gathering of relief funds. American Jewry is responding nobly to the call for help, and historians will set down in unperishable letters the aid that has been given by Jews of this country.

Notwithstanding the readiness to which appeals have been responded to and the additional burden that has been placed upon the Jews of this country, the Central Committee is sure that Mercy Week will find the Jewish community of this country as willing as ever to give of their means for the alleviation of the anguish of the millions of their co-religionists on the other side. The Central Committee asks all communities and organizations co-operating with it to make immediate arrangements for Mercy Week. The committee is ready to give every help from its central offices, 51 Chambers street, New York, N. Y.

WELFARE SURVEY TO BE MADE FOR B'NAI B'RITH.

Welfare work in penal institutions was discussed at a meeting of the social service committee of District Grand Lodge No. 2, B'nai B'rith, Dec. 30, at Indianapolis.

The necessity of furnishing the Jewish Bible to prisoners in penal institutions throughout the district was urged. It was pointed out that out of the sixty-nine Jewish prisoners paroled from the Ohio state penitentiary during the past five years only two have been returned to the institution for violation of parole. It was moved and seconded that the chairman and the president of the Grand Lodge be empowered to expend a sum not to exceed $300 for the purchase of Bibles for distribution among Jewish prisoners in penal institutions in the district, provided that an appropriation for this purpose be first secured from the Grand Lodge upon the recommendation of the general committee.

The committee decided to have a new survey made of how many Jews there are in the penal, charitable and eleemosynary institutions throughout the district. It was agreed at the meeting that if this survey should disclose the urgent need of new Jewish institutions in a particular community, efforts should be made by the B'nai B'rith, in co-operation with the local community, to fulfill the need. It was also decided that every national Jewish institution be requested to notify the social service committee, local or district, of the date and circumstances of the discharge of each patient or inmate, so that the community to which the patient or inmate is being returned may make adequate provision for proper living conditions and suitable environment.

THE AMERICAN SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' WELFARE LEAGUE OF THE INDEPENDENT ORDER OF B'NAI B'RITH

Since the last report, the work of the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League has expanded, particularly in Districts No. 2 and 3. District No. 2 is making gigantic efforts to establish recreation headquarters at all the cantonments and army camps within its confines. Rabbi Joseph Leiser, of Joplin, Mo., has already been engaged to take charge of the recreation rooms at Camp Sherman, Chillicothe, O., and workers for Camp Funston and Ft. Riley are being considered. President Borinstein has recently made a trip through District No. 2 and reports the greatest enthusiasm for the work among the members of that district.

District No. 3 is considering the engagement of a field secretary to look over the territory within its confines for the purpose of considering places where recreation club rooms may be necessary.

District No. 4 has decided to equip recreation rooms at Tacoma, Wash., near Camp Lewis, and a director for that work is about to be engaged.

In District No. 6 and 7 where the larger number of active headquarters are located, the work has grown apace. Many letters have been received and are being daily received from the soldiers, their relatives and friends regarding what is being done. The activities have not lessened, except in those places where the camps have been quarantined, notably Camp Beauregard at Alexandria, La., and Camp Bowie, Ft. Worth, Tex., where a very rigid quarantine has been enforced for the larger part of the month of December.

CAMP DODGE, DES MOINES, IOWA

A number of affairs were given for the men during the month of December. A patriotic meeting was held at which about 100 were present. Addresses were delivered by Lieutenants Samuel Abramson, Samuel Miller, Louis Perlman, and Rabbi Eugene Mannheimer, who was chairman of this meeting spoke on "The Duties of the Civilian". The ladies of Rabbi Cohen's congregation also gave dancing parties and buffiet luncheons. During the first half of December, a large number of men were sent away from Camp Dodge and consequently the attendance at the club rooms fell off to about 100 a week. On Sunday afternoon and evening, Dec. 16, a Chanukah entertainment was given by the Ladies' Auxiliary of Congregation Tifereth Israel at our club rooms. The rooms were full to capacity, 60 boys in uniform and 100 civilians attending. A Chanukah program was rendered and among those taking part in it were Seargeant Sidney Levy, of St. Paul; Delores Edison, little daughter of Captain Edison, and Private Joseph Kaufman. At 6 o'clock buffet supper was served. Between Dec. 19 and Jan. 1, three large affairs were given and all were unusually well attended. The ladies of Rabbi Mannheimer's Temple gave a supper and 65 men in uniform showed up. On New Year's evening an entertainment and dancing party were given, at which a program was rendered and a feature of which was an address by Sergeant Joseph Black, born in Belfast, Ireland, who has seen twelve years of service in the British army and fourteen years in service in the American army. The headquarters at Des Moines are becoming better known to the newly arrived soldiers in the camp, of whom there are more than a 1,000. A number of men have availed themselves of the privilege of personal loans and up to date many have come for advice regarding matters of personal interest. There are at present five Jewish patients at the base hospital at Camp Dodge and these are being looked after so far as the little things that make their stay at the hospital more pleasant are concerned, by our director. The Jewish men and women of Des Moines are proving themselves truly loyal and good hearted in this work and the soldiers appreciate the aid of the community in this work.

CAMP BOWIE, FT. WORTH, TEXAS

On Nov. 28 a quarantine was placed at Camp Bowie and the soldiers found themselves cut off from the outside world. The following bulletin was posted at the camp by our workers:

> Jewish Soldiers:
> If there is anything which you need and which you cannot obtain on account of the quarantine, phone to headquarters, Lamar 1841, or 6872, and we shall gladly and promptly look after your affairs for you. If you are sick in the base hospital, please let us know immediately.

Rabbi Charles Blumenthal is chairman and Sol Wolfson, local representative of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League. On account of the quarantine it was impossible to give any affairs, but during the month 150 copies of magazines were distributed among the men. A very cold spell came over the south and it was found that the mortality of the men was increasing frightfully, due to the lack of proper equipment. Our representatives in Ft. Worth purchased 100 pairs of blankets and distributed them among men in the camp. These were paid for by the local community. We quote from the report of the work at Ft. Worth:

> "Dec. 11—We visited said camp to verify the statement of Mr. Goldenberg. We found it to be only too true that 100 men of the 42nd Wing Repair Section of the Royal Flying Corps, which are now under the supervision of the U. S. Government, sleep on the bare floor in Barracks No. 6, by the way, an improvised winter housing. Had a conversation with about twenty of the boys, and they were very much despondent, thinking that they were mistreated because they were Canadians. The soldiers in the other barracks did have beds and mattresses. Out of the 100 men, two were Jews, Goldenberg and Cooper, both Englishmen. We returned to the city, and called on the office of the headquarters of Camp Taliaferro, and had a talk with Adjutant Connelly. I made a statement to him what I had seen, and asked him the reason of their oversight. An investigation followed immediately, and it was found that beds and mattresses were somewhere in a car that had been switched off for the last three weeks. On the 14th, we received a letter thanking us for the interest we took in the case, and stating that beds and mattresses had been issued to them".

Among the visitors at our headquarters in Ft. Worth was Sergeant Bloch, a French Jew who was one of those sent from France to act as instructor in the American army. On Dec. 17 the furlough was lifted at Camp Bowie and a number of men were permitted to return home, but many found themselves short of funds and consequently our representatives at Ft. Worth found it necessary to advance a number of soldiers with small loans with which to go home. The attention of Rabbi Blumenthal was called to the case of a deserter and it was only through the Rabbi's excellent work that the charge of desertion was changed to that of absence without leave.

On Dec. 22 a dance and big entertainment was given to the boys and although only 50 per cent of the men were permitted to leave the camp and though many of those had gone to their various homes on furlough, there were 75 soldiers present including two French and two English officers. Refreshments, consisting of coffee and cake were served by the ladies, and foot warmers were distributed to the boys. Plans were also made on this evening for a girls' minstrel show for the benefit of the soldiers on Saturday night, Jan. 5.

On Tuesday night, Dec. 25, the Girls' Assembly Club gave a grand dance in honor of the Jewish soldiers in Camp Bowie and the boys at the aviation camps. More than 80 soldiers were present. On Saturday night, Dec. 29 the last affair of December was given, and this was one of the most successful affairs of the winter. During the latter part of December a consignment of 98 books was received at our headquarters from the Camp Bowie library, which will increase materially our library resources. During this month our communications with the base hospital were unusually many, although, of course, our visits were not as numerous because of the quarantine.

CAMP BEAUREGARD, ALEXANDRIA, LA.

On account of the quarantine at Camp Beauregard there has been practically no activity in the club rooms. The larger part of the work of our director has been the personal service he has rendered to the men in camp. The hall has not been attended as well as usual on account of the fact that the men have not been able to get away. The entire Louisiana regiment is again under quarantine on account of the prevalence of meningitis and the United States Health Officer has advised the postponements of public functions for soldiers. Our director has visited the hospital whenever necessary and during the past month he has had an extraordinary amount of personal service work, consisting largely of interviews with soldiers and writing to their relatives of the welfare of these men, as it seems that many of these are not permitted to write while the general quarantine was in force. The branch at Alexandria is looking forward to the lifting of the quarantine when it may again take up its activities.

CAMP LOGAN, HOUSTON, TEXAS

The headquarters at Houston and the local branch and the director have been more than ordinarily busy this month. A mass meeting was called the early part of December and the Houston branch of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League was enlarged and new officers elected: Meyer C. Wagner, president; Jules Hirsch, treasurer; Edgar Goldberg, secretary, and Bernard Freefield, field director. A number of committees were elected. During the month of December the estimated attendance at Houston was almost 2,000. The hospital was visited practically every day and every sick man in uniform was seen. Fifteen sweaters were given out to the sick and a number of scarfs, wristlets and socks were also distributed. Eighty-six men availed themselves of the personal service of our worker and three men were examined through the courtesy of the physician who is working in connection with our branch. The soldiers' volunteer representatives' meeting and smoker was attended by fifteen men who are acting as assistants to the director in Houston. One thousand and eighty men attended different affairs that were given during the month of December for the benefit of the soldiers. A number of Chanukah boxes were distributed to the sick. Mrs. M. E. Weinberg, of Chicago, prominent in Jewish circles, visited the camp. Among the organizations which gave affairs for soldiers through the Houston branch of the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League were: The Jewish Literary Society, the Y. M. H. A., the Concordia Club and the I. O. B. B. lodges.

Dr. Henry Barnstein delivered a lecture on "America and the War", on Saturday night, Dec. 8, which was largely attended. Rabbi Samuel Rosinger, of Beaumont, Texas, sent a number of boxes for Chanukah, which were distributed.

CAMP SHELBY, HATTIESBURG, MISS.

Camp Shelby has had a busy month. The attendance at the Headquarters for the month has been very close to 2,300 men. Two hundred and thirty-three men have used the sleeping quarters. Dr. Alfred G. Moses of Mobile, Ala., visited the Headquarters on Dec. 19 and delivered an address. He also spoke at the Y. M. C. A. on the "World War and Democracy".

A large Chanukah celebration was held on Sunday, Dec. 9, and a musical program was rendered by the men from the camp and by the 149th Infantry Band. Capt. Max Neumann delivered an address. Dr. A. Brill of Meridian, Miss., sent Chanukah souvenirs which were distributed. The total number of personal interviews with soldiers was 320. On New Year's eve there was an entertainment and luncheon attended by over 100 men and the 149th Infantry furnished the music. Nine visits to the hospital and eighteen visits to the camp were made. A number of the boys here, as at other places, availed themselves of the loan fund that has been created, and loans aggregating a large sum were made to sixteen men. At Camp Shelby also a Jewish boy left without leave of absence and after our worker was called in the charge against this man was changed from desertion to that of absence without leave. We quote from the report of our worker: "It is a pleasure to note that the percentage of illness among our Jewish boys is a great deal less than among others. So far, none of our boys have been seriously ill, although two have had minor operations".

CAMP GRANT, ROCKFORD, ILL.

Our headquarters continue as usual to be open all day and evening and our attendance has varied from a few on weekdays to from 100 to 150 on Saturdays and Sundays respectively. For sometime, due to the courtesy of the Isaiah Club, Jochanan Lodge, Sinai Auxiliary, the Council of Jewish Women and individuals, we have been in a position to serve on any evening or on Saturday afternoon to any soldier who frequents our hall light refreshments, consisting of coffee, cake, fruit, etc. This feature, though no doubt appearing as rather insignificant to the outsider, is a valuable asset in the work, making the soldier feel that he is among friends who are solicitous about his welfare, and who are anxious to accord him as much hospitality as possible.

For December 25th, a day when no soldier was required to attend to military duties, an affair had been planned and cards issued, but owing to the sudden allowance of the furlough, which took 90 per cent of the boys away from the camp, this was cancelled. The affair was held on January 1st, New Year's afternoon, and consisted of a professional vaudeville entertainment of five numbers. The supper was served through the courtesy of the aforementioned organizations and individuals, and "smokes" were served through the courtesy of Mr. Maurice Leopold and several others. The 343rd Regimental Band furnished the music for dancing, which continued until 9 P. M. There were present about 275 soldiers and about 100 civilians.

At the present writing another vaudeville smoker is to be held on Sunday afternoon and evening, January 20th, and on February 17th the Council of Jewish Women of Chicago are arranging an entertainment and dance to be given at our headquarters, for which occasion they are arranging to bring to Rockford several hundred young ladies from Chicago.

We append herewith typical letters from men in uniform, their friends and relatives. We are citing these so that our readers and friends may know what others are thinking of our work:

Dec. 21, 1917.

Dr. George Fox,
Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League,
Chicago.

Dear Sir—I really cannot say enough to express the feelings of not only myself but the other boys whom I feel sure I can speak for, in regard to the splendid work that the B'nai B'rith is doing in Des Moines for the boys of Camp Dodge. They are providing, first of all, a place for the boys to go to when they get to town and get acquainted with the Jewish people in Des Moines. They give quite a number of entertainments, which I am sure would be patronized a good deal more if there were more Jewish boys at camp, but owing to the fact that there are very few Jewish boys, these affairs may appear to an outsider as failures, but really, taking into consideration the small number of boys there, and the small percentage that can attend when they are given, they are very well patronized.

Through the B'nai B'rith we are meeting the Jewish people of Des Moines, who invite us to their homes on Friday evening and Sunday afternoon, where they entertain us to the best of their ability and make the boys feel at home. There is nothing a Jewish boy likes better than a real home-cooked dinner, and they certainly are getting it in Des Moines.

In conclusion allow me to once more say that, speaking as an individual and also speaking for the remainder of the Jewish boys, that we certainly do appreciate the work of the B'nai B'rith, and we all know that although it will be impossible to pay them back financially, we will try to live up to the name of the Jew and keep the name as clean as it has been in the past and certainly will be in the future.

PVT. JOSEPH LAPIN,
Med. Dept., 350th Inf., Camp Dodge, Ia.

Dec. 31, 1917.

Mr. Meyer Desenberg, Jr.,
Chicago, Ill.

Dear Friend—I want to tell you that I attended that big affair the I. O. B. B. gave one Sunday. I believe it was on Dec. 9 at Rockford, when a large crowd of ladies and gentlemen were present from both Chicago and Rockford, and I can say it was a grand affair and I never enjoyed myself better anywhere. There were also some soldiers present that were Gentiles that I know and they were also well pleased with the entertainment and said it takes the Jews to get up something like that.

Sincerely,
JACK B. VICTOR,
343rd Inf., Co. H.

Battle Creek, Mich., Dec. 26, 1917.
Mr. Samuel Folz,
Kalamazoo, Mich.

Dear Sir—Gratitude and appreciation prompt me to write these few lines of congratulation on the wonderful work that the club rooms of the B'nai B'rith in this city are doing. You, as this state's representative, should know how "the boys" feel about it, hence this letter.

My home is in Baltimore, Md., and as you can surmise I'm a total stranger in this state. Incidentally, I am the only Jew in a company of 153 men, and I can appreciate this great work much more than others who are native born and not so far from home.

In my leisure time, Wednesdays especially, I for one find rest, recreation and friends, whereas before the club was opened I spent these few hours wandering aimlessly about and usually returning to camp gloomy and morose in spirit. That, thanks to your efforts, is entirely done away with.

Might I just say a word for the ladies of this city, who are striving at all times to make things pleasant and comfortable for me and my comrades in arms?

Instead of war being a grim, tiresome task, you and your associates are making our fight for democracy a pleasant, smiling task and not one to be feared.

May the new year bring you lots of success and the victorious termination of this terrible slaughter. With kindest personal regards, I am, sir,

Very sincerely yours,
CORP. LEONARD L. GROTTE,
340th Ambulance Co., Camp Custer.

Louisville, Ky., Jan. 3, 1918.
Mr. S. C. Blumenthal,
Alexandria, La.

Dear Sir—I wish to thank you for the great work you and your organization, the B'nai B'rith, are doing for the Jewish soldier boys at the camps. I was happy to hear that my brother, Hyman, at Camp Beauregard is getting along fine.

Thanking you for your letter and kindness, I remain
Yours truly,
(Signed) HARRY KURTZ.

The following letter appeared in the "Sentinel" Jan. 12:

"To the Editor, the 'Sentinel':

"My mother sends me her copy of the 'Sentinel' every week. I noticed with indeed much pleasure the publicity you are giving the work of the B'nai B'rith.

"If I may express it that way, the hall that the above mentioned organization is maintaining is a 'life-saver'. Really, when we fellows do come to town we don't know what to do with ourselves. Of course, we go to shows, but there is so much time to spare. Instead of walking the streets and possibly getting into the chief, we go up to the 'club' and have a wonderful time.

'Among other things, we have coffee and cake, and, believe me, it tastes good these cold days.

"The director in charge, A. Horvitz, is a 'peach' and we all admire and respect him. He sure is doing splendid work.

"Would suggest that you give the B'nai B'rith the required publicity, so that they may get their fund, for we want the work to continue. By helping them you help us, and by helping us you help the country. So 'chip in'.

Hurrah for the B'nai B'rith and Horvitz.
"Respectfully,
"CHARLES N. TROTCKY,
"343rd Reg. Inf., Camp Grant, Ill".

Indianapolis, Ind., Dec. 5, 1917.
Mr. S. London,
P. O. Box 568, Hattiesburg, Miss.

Dear Sir—I want to thank you personally, and also in behalf of the parents of the Indianapolis Jewish soldiers at Camp Shelby. for the good treatment you have shown the boys. Mr. Louis B. Davis of Battery B, 139th Field Artillery, has written to me in regards to the good work done in Hattiesburg by the welfare league of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, of which you are secretary. I certainly appreciate your good work and will be glad at any time to let the public know of the good work done by the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League. Will be pleased if you will at any time send me anything for publication, and think I can get space for same in the Indianapolis "Star" newspaper.

Very truly yours,
IZZY BRILL,
102 S. Illinois St., Indianapolis.

THE RIGHT SORT.

A home!

Not for Jew or Gentile, Methodist, Presbyterian or Catholic, democrat, republican or socialist, but for all soldier boys of every sect and creed who are at Camp Lewis preparing to fight for the liberties of all of us.

Not for the men who give orders, nor for the men who obey orders, but for officers and enlisted men alike.

That's the kind of a home the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith says it will equip for Camp Lewis soldiers in the building occupied by the Monarch Club at South Sixth and Broadway.

The B'nai B'rith has just signed a three-year lease for the building. The spirit with which this Jewish organization intends to run its clubhouse for soldiers after the first of the year is the same spirit it has shown in the community in the past—that of public service and progress.

It is a spirit that plunges into a thing and sees it through, not for the advancement of Jews alone, but for the cause of freedom loving people everywhere.

Because the B'nai B'rith membership is back of this club home for soldiers Tacoma may be assured that it will be run with that forward-looking energy which has marked the progress of every activity in which the organization has taken a hand.

It will be a real home, a welcome place for the soldier who is a stranger here, and an asset to the city.—An editorial from the Tacoma "Times".

JEWS HONORED IN SEVERAL LANDS.

The first Jew to be elected to the National Council of Switzerland was returned recently. This distinction fell to M. M. Goetschel, a lawyer of Dellemont. Fifty-one years had passed since the emancipation of the Jews in Switzerland before one of their number obtained a seat in Parliament.

M. Louis Lucien Klotz retains, in M. Clemenceau's cabinet, the post of Minister of Finance, which he had held in M. Plainleve's cabinet, as in several other previous cabinets. M. Edouard Ignace, a member for Paris in the Chamber of Deputies, has been appointed Under Secretary of State for War. He is a lawyer by profession and practices in the Court of Appeals. M. Clemenceau has appointed M. Georges Mandel as his principal Private Secretary.

Signor Morpurgo is Under Secretary of State for Industry and Commerce and Signor Reggio is Under Secretary of State for Transports in the recently formed Italian Ministry.

The French Academy of Science has awarded the Tchehadcheff prize of 3000 francs to Sir Marc Auries Stein, Inspector of the Indian Archaeological Survey, for his explorations in Central Asia.

Samuel William Jacobs was elected a member of the Canadian Parliament in the recent elections. He is the first Jew returned to the Canadian Parliament and his election was greeted with much satisfaction by the Jews there. Mr. Jacobs was the candidate of the Liberal Party and received a very large vote.

CRAGG REMOVED AS DRAFT BOARD CHAIRMAN.

Samuel H. Cragg, of Brooklyn, who has made an unenviable reputation for himself in the last few months by his direct and indirect attacks upon the Jewish race, and who aroused the ire of the Jews some two weeks ago by casting a slur upon the patriotism of the Jew, remarking at a flag unfurling service that one of the three joyous occasions in the life of a Jew was his exemption from military service—was removed from the position of Chairman of Local Draft Board No. 34, by Adjutant General Charles E. Sherrill, acting on directions from Governor Whitman. In announcing the removal the Adjutant General gave out a statement on behalf of the Governor, in which the latter declared that Cragg had no excuse for making the remark he did and that no course was left to the Governor after hearing the evidence in the case but to remove him.

Cragg heard of his removal soon after the decision was reached by the Governor, and when questioned over the telephone retorted by insinuating that he was being made the victim of somebody's political ambitions. He did not specify whose, but again reiterated his innocence of any desire to offend the Jewish race.

In his statement removing Cragg from office Adjutant General Sherrill said among other things: "Mr. Cragg has admitted that he made this statement (about the Jews) and there is no real dispute as to any of the important facts. His only defense was that ne uttered it in jest.

"As soon as the Governor learned of the occurrence he sent for Mr. Cragg and he came to Albany. After hearing his admission the Governor asked him to resign.

"The country is at war. This is no time to excite racial prejudices. No time for a public officer to ridicule any race or religion in connection with its duties toward the Government. There is no excuse for what was said and no other course was open to the Governor of the State except to cause the severance of Mr. Craig's relations with the draft."

In the moral and physical world not only the field of battle, but also the consecrated cause of truth and virtue calls for champions, and he who enlists in its ranks and his spirit faints not may write his name among the stars of heaven.

THE GREATEST BIRTHDAY IN ALL HISTORY.

The Whole World Celebrates It Regardless of Religious Belief.

One thousand nine hundred and seventeen years ago a beautiful young Jewish woman, forgetting her poverty, not seeing the animals about her in the stable, seeing nothing but the tiny face of the baby in her arms, was made eternally blessed by that child.

And blessed have been the world's mothers since that day, by the work that the child of Mary has done in the hearts of men through the long centuries.

Christmas is a blessed birthday; it is the birthday of human kindness.

Christ preached, lived and died for the poor, for those that had no friend but Himself.

For the sake of the poor, He died a condemned criminal and despised. And He lived among the poor as one of them.

"The foxes have holes and the birds of the air have nests; but the son of man hath not where to lay his head".—Matthew viii., 30.

Many lessons that Christ taught are still to be learned. The world will learn them and live eventually according to His teachings.

With war and murder waging, we know that in the end this earth will have peace, perpetual, and that the holy Sermon on the Mount will rule the human race.

The earth is filled with hatred, intolerance.

Low superstition among so-called Christians, here as well as in Europe, hates and persecutes the Jews.

But the day will come when this injustice will disappear and men will realize that to the Jewish race we owe the mother of Jesus, the care she gave to her child, and that the Jewish religion was the basis of Christ's religious teachings.

Vicious, ignorant hate has sought to perpetuate race and religious bitterness by representing the crucifixion as a Jewish punishment inflicted by Jews on the founder of Christianity.

Crucifixion was a Roman punishment, unknown to the Jews, detested by them, inflicted by Romans upon criminals, inflicted by a Roman government and a Roman governor in Jerusalem upon Christ as upon the thieves crucified on either side of Him.

It was not a Jew, but Caesar, the great Roman, who exultantly testified that he had caught and crucified pirates that once held him prisoner on their ship.

That should be taught to the children, that crucifixion was a punishment of Roman pagans, unknown to the Jews, and one historic lie will die.

The historic lie that the Jews crucified Christ will die with other lies, including "the divine right of kings" lie, and many another.

Among the Jews a few of the privileged, powerful and dishonest hated Christ, as with us the most powerful hate any man that defends the poor and attacks selfish privilege.

Those for whom Christ lived and died loved Him, among the Jews in His lifetime, and since then throughout the world.

"And the common people heard him gladly".—Mark xii., 37.

Until hatred dies out between nations, individuals, religions and classes, Christ's work will not be complete.

"If God so loved us, we ought also to love one another.

"If a man say, I love God and hateth his brother, he is a liar; for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?

"And this commandment have we from Him, That he who loveth God love his brother also".—John 1 Epistle, Chap. 4.

That is the teaching and the law, about all there is of the law—and no man can dodge it whatever his color, race, religion. The only exception is the man whose God is money.

To all of our readers we wish a happy, prosperous and useful New Year.

Make good resolutions today and keep them.

He who will succeed can succeed.—Chicago "American".

LOS ANGELES RABBI WRITES ACROSTIC DICTIONARY.

The latest of the volumes of cleverness put forth by Rabbi Isidore Myers of Los Angeles is an acrostic dictionary. We quote two of these acrostics referring to the B'nai B'rith:

B'NAI B'RITH—Bearing noble aspirations, Israel brings righteous ideals to humanity.

I. O. B. B.—Israel's Organized Beneficent Brotherhood.

THE PSALMISTS.

content themselves with the [illegible] dictment of their enemie[illegible] enemies of truth and righteo[illegible] they leave the avenging to [illegible] alone is the King and the J[illegible] world.

Let sinners cease out of the earth,
And let the wicked be no more.
(Psalms CIV 3[illegible].)

to the end that man shall know that Verily there is a reward for the righteous,
Verily there is a God that judgeth in the earth.
(LVIII 12.)

For the manifestation of Divine judgment upon the wicked, the Psalmists—like all the religious thinkers of ancient Israel—looked to the earthly life of man, for while they did not regard death as the total annihilation of the human personality, they attached little if any moral significance to the continued existence after death, holding out neither rewards nor punishments in the shadowy hereafter. Neither did the belief in the resurrection of the body or in the immortality of the soul from an essential doctrine in the faith of the Psalmists. These are at best intimations or hopes of the human heart. For the final adjustment of life's topsy-turvydom, the Psalmists did not turn to these uncertain longings. They rather sought it in man's earthly existence, in his misery and happiness, which they regarded the natural outgrowths of his actions. With their deep sense of social responsibility, they emphasized that man's deeds for good or for ill, affect the lives of his children—in whom his life continues—and the fortunes of his community and nation, of which he is a part. The thoughts of the punishment of sin and of the bitterness of death, together with the thought of the brevity of man's life-span and the longing for companionship with God, were for the Psalmists the great motive powers of and incentives to morality. (XC.) Separation from God through sin and iniquity, was to them the darkest hell; nearness to and union with God was their heaven.

In this conviction, the Psalmists dwell upon the charms of the Godly life. In varied forms, they proclaim their belief in the spiritual bliss of the righteous, and in the ultimate misery of the wicked. From the lofty heights of their idealism, they look down with contempt and pity upon those who love to dwell in the mire of moral degradation. And, confidently they announce that "Light is sown for the righteous and joy for the upright in heart". They that are clean of hands and pure of heart, who have not lifted up their souls to falsehood nor sworn deceitfully, and who work righteousness, shall ascend the hill of the Lord and stand in His holy place. (XV, XXIV.)

The Psalmists sound the depths of human woe and scale the heights of exaltation. Their lyre sobs in grief, sorrow, fear, remorse, penitence, and contrition; it also sings of hope, confidence, gratitude, love, joy, and adoration. Despite an occasional harsh note, they dwell on the serene heights of religion, beholding God rejoicing in His creatures, ruling all the world in justice, and extending unto all His loving kindness. They cheered all hearts with their joyful message of God's unfailing help and guidance.

Behold, He that keepeth Israel
Doth neither slumber nor sleep!
(Psalms CXXI:4.)

The strains of David's music brought healing balm to the melancholy King Saul. Even so have David and his fellow-Psalmists soothed sick and despondent humanity with their melodious songs. In the hour of creation—says the author of Job—the morning stars sang together, and the sons of God shouted for joy. The gladsome song of the spheres echoes and re-echoes in all the Psalms. Their grand symphonies on life and destiny thrill and strengthen us. They are a call to duty and an assurance of divine help, a solace and a prayer. Justly may Israel say: "He hath put a new song in my mouth, even praise unto our God; many shall see and fear and shall trust in the Lord". Through their irresistible genuineness, they became the inalienable possession of all civilized humanity. These songs of the Temple in Jerusalem have become inseparable from every home and house of worship in all lands, whenever in joy or in grief Jew or Christian raises his voice unto God.

Fuerst, member of the propaganda committee of the district, presided at the meeting. Brother Borinstein was the guest of honor at a dinner and in the evening there was a reception and dance. As District No. 2 will hold its next annual meeting in Akron May 26, there is a great deal of enthusiasm and activity in B'nai B'rith circles there, plans now being under way to gain 100 new members.

Throughout his tour the president not only made addresses but conferred with prominent B'nai B'rith workers, discussing the activities of the Order and particularly the welfare work contemplated by the Order. Everywhere he was greeted with enthusiasm and the fine spirit manifested by the lodges convinced him that District Grand Lodge, No. 2 is not only flourishing, but still remains the banner district of the Order.

HARMONY LODGE, BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

Mr. Herman Bernstein, world renowned journalist, delivered the second lecture on Dec. 14, 1917, at the newly established "forum" under the auspices of Harmony Lodge No. 711, Bridgeport, Conn. His subject dealt with Russia's past and present and the conditions of its people.

He said in part. "The Russian revolution is not yet ended; the final acts are still to come, therefore complete analysis of the Russian revolution is not yet possible.

"Russian life knows only extremes, that is why the people who advocate compromises have proved unsuccessful thus far.

"Hundreds of thousands of people have suffered and died for Russia's freedom in the last 19 centuries, the best sons and daughters of Russia have been exiled, persecuted, tortured in Siberian dungeons for the cause of freedom. The great Russian revolution last March was not organized—it was made by everybody and by nobody. The old despotic reign perished in its own rottenness.

"Russia is to undergo many trials and experiences and has many sorrows to suffer as the result of this revolution, but the Russian organization will survive and grow stronger and when the younger generation of Russia has schools throughout the country and grows up unhindered by ignorance unhindered by the corrupt influence of Czarism that spreads hatred and race prejudice, Russia will, in every respect, be one of the most powerful democracies of the world.

"The present government, in my opinion will crumble and the Russian people will realize the folly of their acts", Mr. Bernstein said. Asked if he thought that Kerensky is still in Russia Mr. Bernstein stated that Kerensky is in Russia and that the time is near when he will once more be the real leader of Russia.

Preceding Mr. Bernstein's talk regular services were held and Joshua Meltzer officiated.

The Intellectual Advancement Committee of which Bro. Charles H. Shapiro is chairman, has announced that next month Mr. Harry O. Sandberg of the U. S. Department of Commerce will deliver a lecture on "The Jews of Latin America" and on the following month Dr. Otis Glazebrook, formerly U. S. Counsul at Jerusalem, is expected to speak on Palestine and other addresses for the remainder of the season are being planned, the formu having met with much success.

ABRAHAM LODGE, BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

At the annual meeting of Abraham Lodge No. 89, held on Dec. 16, 1917, which brought out a large attendance, the officers for the ensuing year were elected as well as representatives to the Convention of the District Grand Lodge. The retiring president J. B. Klein, made an address in which he spoke of the welfare work taken up for the benefit of the Jewish men who have entered the U. S. service. This was followed by a report from the committee on Jewish activities and welfare work to the effect that Abraham Lodge which started this work for the relief of the poor who have dependents in the national army camps and looking after the welfare of the soldiers in camps, has succeeded in securing the cooperation of the Jewish societies in Bridgeport in the work so that there will be co-operation and no duplication of the effort.

The installation of the elected officers for the ensuing year was held on Sunday, Jan. 6, 1918, and was a public affair.

As a result of the affair sixty thousand dollars was the magnificent contribution the Jews of Tulsa made to the Jewish War Relief Fund.

It was the most remarkable achievement of the kind that has occurred in this city, noted for its generosity and big things in raising money for charities, war funds and public enterprises.

Marion Travis and associates of the Mid-Co. Oil company led the list of contributors by giving a dollar for every dollar contributed at the meeting. The announcement of their offer was greeted with a big outburst of applause when it was made and the Jews of the city opened their purses in great liberality.

$10,000 Donation.

Sam Travis immediately started the fund by announcing a $10,000 donation. He had already contributed $15,000 to the fund recently while in New York. The Livingston Oil company gave $2,000 and Dr. R. Francis of Kansas City gave $3,000. Max Travis gave $1,000.

The following contributed $500 each: H. Stekoll, R. Stekoll, R. Fohs, Oleson Brothers, Simon Jankowsky, Joe Davis and Max Rubin.

Ruby Brothers gave $300, and the following $250 each: Emil Offenbacher, Madansky Brothers, Bernard Douglas, J. Beren and J. Block. M. Renberg gave $200 and Sim Sitron $100.

In addition to his $1,000 subscription Max Travis announced that he would give 2 per cent of the total amount of the fund raised for each of his children.

Many $100 and $50 and $25 subscriptions were announced.

At the close of the meeting a lunch was served at midnight and dancing followed for an hour or more.

Emil Offenbacher, president of the B'nai B'rith, presided and did it with much grace and ability. His opening talk was one of the best of the evening.

Tableaux a Feature.

The feature of the program was a beautifully conceived tableau in two parts posed by a dozen or more men and women representing Jewish families being driven in exile from their homes and turning their faces toward America.

Another tableau represented the victory of the Maccabeans in the restoration of Palestine during the reign of Antiochus, 340 A. D.

The chief speech of the evening was made by Jacob L. Lorie, a prominent attorney and Ben B'rith of Kansas City, and he delivered a strong, sympathetic address that went straight to the hearts of his hearers. He briefly described conditions of the suffering Jews in Lithuania, Bukowina, Poland and Galicia and begged for the most liberal donations to help them.

Doctor Joseph Blatt, a prominent rabbi from Oklahoma City, was another speaker and he talked eloquently for the relief fund. He said loyalty was uppermost in the minds of the people at this time and he appealed to the Jews of Tulsa to be loyal to their race and help alleviate the suffering of members of it across the sea.

He spoke of the devotion and patriotism of the Jews of America to the Stars and Stripes, of their liberality in purchasing Liberty bonds and subscribing to the various war funds and charities, and made a strong appeal for the Red Cross membership campaign which begins today. "We and our sons are ready, if necessary", he said, "to make the supreme sacrifice, to give up their lives for their country".

A musical program preceded the speeches, in which vocal solos were given by Mr. de Gueldre and Mr. Carl Ehrman, who won two encores with his excellent baritone voice. Miss Cogswell gave a number of violin solos, accompanied by Miss Margaret Ringold at the piano.

During the evening boxes of candies, kodaks and many articles especially popular as gifts were "raffled" off by young men of the B'nai B'rith.

In his review of the accomplishments of the Order since its inception, he pointed out the number of achievements, present activities and plans for the future. He dwelt in his address in some length on special work of the Order on lines of Anti-Defamation, Social Service and Soldiers' Welfare work. At the close of his address the members arose spontaneously and tendered to the speaker a rousing ovation.

Brother O. G. Finkelstein as Director of the membership campaign held by the lodge for a period of two weeks submitted detailed report showing that five hundred and fifty-six candidates were secured in the brief campaign lasting for two weeks. The lodge resolved in recognition of the good work accomplished by the various teams of the membership campaign to entertain the Captains of the various teams and such of the members as have secured their allotted quota with a dinner at the Covenant Club Hall in the near future.

The Entertainment Committee through its chairman presented report as to arrangements for a Minstrel Show to be given under the auspices of the lodge on February 24, 1918 at the Hotel La Salle, the net proceeds of which to be devoted for Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare work.

Oriental Hillel Lodge.

Preceding the meeting dinner was served to the members of the Club at which more than two hundred participated. The guest of honor at the dinner was Judge Kenesaw M. Landis of United States District Court, who delivered a most eloquent address upon the war situation. He discussed the causes underlying the present war, its rapid progress, its ultimate effect upon the peoples of the earth, and in closing made a strong appeal for undivided support to the United States government in the attainment of these objects to secure a lasting peace throughout the world and the establishment of democratic institution to the government of the various peoples. The audience responded by rising and cheering the speaker for nearly two minutes. At the close of the address an informal reception was held affording the speaker an opportunity to personally meet the members of the lodge. Hon. The lodge was informed of a special entertainment and gala evening being arranged for the next meeting of the lodge to be held on Monday, January 21, 1918.

Covenant Club.

The Entertainment Committee of the Club carried out the most elaborate program for Christmas Eve which was participated in by more than three hundred of the members and some of their friends. A varied program consisting of vocal and musical numbers, dancing, monologue and athletic exhibitions served to make all those participating in the event feel most happy. A club supper was served to all the members, bountiful in quantity and excellent in quality. At the close of the program moving pictures were exhibited. At the close of the evening's program all the members and their guests participated in various games and spent a very pleasant evening until early hours in the morning.

On New -Years' Eve a formal party was arranged by the Entertainment Committee for the members of the Club, their ladies and friends. Three hundred covers were laid and the capacity of the premises was taxed to its maximum. Dancing was indulged in from nine until eleven and then a most elegant supper was furnished during which a program consisting of vaudeville numbers, dancing and singing was successfully carried out. At one o'clock dancing was resumed which lasted until four in the morning. All those participating in this splendid New Years' Eve party expressed themselves as most pleased.

The Entertainment Committee is arranging for a unique entertainment to be held on Saturday, January 26, 1918 on which evening the rooms of the Club will be changed into a replica of Rocky Gulch, being a massive scenic production of a mining camp in California, gold hunting days of '49.

Under the auspices of the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League of the I. O. B. B. the committee on religious welfare held services at Camp Logan on Sunday mornings, January 6 and 13, 1918. ESHCOL LODGE, DAYTON, OHIO.

Eshcol Lodge No. 55 of Dayton, Ohio, is assured of a year of pleasing activities, as President Shaman has appointed Brother Joseph T. Cline chairman of the Propaganda Committee for the year. Dr. Cline has manifested his ability in many ways, particularly with the splendid bulletin which he is editing for Eshcol Lodge, known as the "B'nai B'rith Booster".

Dr. Cline has already arranged for a number of interesting speakers to entertain the members at different meetings. "Dental Hygiene" will be the subject of a lecture Dr. Russa will deliver on Sunday, Feb. 3, and "First Aid", with lantern slides and demonstrations by Dr. Neuberger, at the meeting of the lodge on Feb. 17.

A program will soon be published spreading over several months containing various activities of the lodge in intellectual advancement matters.

It will be the policy of the committee to have musical numbers in addition to speakers at each meeting. Arrangements are also being made for a big charity ball to be held on Purim, the proceeds of which are to be devoted to soldiers' and sailors' welfare work.

OMAHA LODGE ARRANGES BANQUET AND ENTERTAINMENT FOR SOLDIERS.

On Thursday evening, Dec. 6, Omaha Lodge No. 354, I. O. B. B., and the Women's Auxiliary were hosts to the Soldiers of Our Faith at a banquet, entertainment and dance given at one of the local hotels. Forty-six of our boys in khaki, stationed at Fort Omaha and Fort Crook, accepted our invitation and appreciated the efforts of the lodge to make them feel at home.

Besides our soldier boys, we had as our guests Bros. L. Edward Lashman, national director of social service of the I. O. B. B., Meyer Silverman, president of Des Moines Lodge, and Brother Levine, secretary of Kansas City, Kans., Lodge.

About 300 of our members, ladies and friends, attended the banquet and entertainment and a pleasant evening was spent in doing honor to our boys in the service.

Brother Arthur Rosenblum, vice-president of Omaha Lodge, acted as toastmaster of the evening. He called upon the president of the lodge, Harry H. Lapidus, who welcomed our boys on behalf of Omaha Lodge and then made a stirring and forceful appeal in behalf of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League of the I. O. B. B.

Blanche Bessel, president of Women's Auxiliary to Omaha Lodge, welcomed the boys in khaki on behalf of the auxiliary in a very cordial manner. Responses were made by Lieut. Max M. Rosenblum, Lieut. Geo. Sugarman, Lieut. Philip Lehman, Lieut. Chas. Berger and Lieut. A. Greenberg.

We then had the pleasure and privilege of listening to Bro. Lashman, who impressed us very much with his vivid account of what the I. O. B. B. is doing at the various cantonment camps towards the betterment of camp life for our boys in the service. This was Bro. Lashman's initial visit to Omaha, and hope that he will be with us again in the near future.

The committee in charge of this affair, Brothers Al. Dreyfoos, Sam J. Leon, Arthur Rosenblum and Dr. A. Greenberg and our worthy president, Harry H. Lapidus, spared no pains in making this affair a grand success. Through their efforts the managers of the various local theaters furnished us with their headline acts, which were greatly appreciated by all present. After the banquet dancing prevailed and all enjoyed themselves immensely.

This is the first of a series of entertainments planned by Omaha Lodge for our soldier boys. At the present time there are about 75 soldiers of Our Faith stationed in Omaha, and we expect many more after the new draft, thus requiring the assistance and co-operation of the Grand Lodge in looking after the social and spiritual welfare of our boys.

Omaha Lodge is growing by leaps and bounds, and before the end of this year we expect to increase our membership to 500 or more.

S. L. ZIMMERMAN.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.

One of the most attractive affairs of the season was an informal Thanksgiving dance given by B. F. Peixotto Lodge No. 421 on the evening of Thanksgiving Day. The affair was largely attended and greatly enjoyed by more than one hundred couples, including the members and their friends.

Feature of the evening was the institution of a Ladies' Auxiliary to the B'nai B'rith Lodge with a roll of thirty-two charter members.

During the intermission Brother M. M. Aron, president of the lodge, made a few remarks and introduced Dr. H. Davis as the Ladies' Auxiliary Deputy to deliver a timely message.

A large service flag for each Ben B'rith of the district in service in the United States is being made for display in the B'nai B'rith Club rooms of San Francisco. This is being done under the auspices of the Committee of Fifty.

B'NAI B'RITH OF CLEVELAND.

He thanked the other officers and the committees of the lodge for their good and faithful work during the past year.

The newly elected president does not expect to retain his office, as he has enlisted in the service of the United States and expects orders in the near future to a Signal Officers' Training Camp for instruction. He will be placed upon the list of past presidents by action of the lodge, at the time he relinquishes his position to take his place in the struggle for democracy.

The new year finds the lodge in a healthy, prosperous condition. Several new members have been added. There have been numerous interesting and entertaining events during the past year. During the last two weeks, Channukah kits were sent to twenty Jewish boys in the camps and cantonments. These boys were all Grand Rapids residents and some of them members of the lodge. The kits contained candy, tobacco and other necessary articles and were most thankfully received by the boys in camp. Bro. Adolph Friedman headed the committee having this work in charge.

The meeting at which the election was held, was honored by the presence of Bro. Edward Lichtig of Bay City, one of the ardent and spirited workers in the district. He spoke at length of the mission and purpose of the lodge.

It was the most enthusiastic meeting ever held in the city, and considering that there are only sixty Jewish families actively engaged in Jewish activities, the result achieved is most gratifying, and much credit for the achievement is due to the active work of the B'nai B'rith leaders in the community.

Brother Henry Smulekoff, the newly elected president of the lodge, pledged at the meeting to give 50 per cent of the net subscriptions received, and as soon as the pledges were counted, which amounted to $4,266.50, Brother Smulekoff presented his personal check for 50 per cent of this amount, namely, $2,133.25.

On Monday the committee of the lodge made a canvass of the city collecting the money subscribed. The net result of the campaign for the Jewish war sufferers amounted to $6,399.75. Morris Schneider, Past President of the District Grand Lodge, and his assistants. Bro. Judge Samuels and Gus Ringolsky gave the members a stirring intellectual treat.

CONSOLIDATION OF B'NAI B'RITH LODGES IN MILWAUKEE.

Gilead Lodge No. 41 and Isaac Lodge No. 87 of Milwaukee held a joint meeting on December 20, 1917, which meeting was called by the General Committee of District Grand Lodge for the purpose of effecting a consolidation of the two lodges. The attendance was gratifying, especially in view of the fact that the weather was most inclement and particularly for the reason that the meeting was held in the busiest week of the year.

The Secretary of the District Grand Lodge accompanied by Brother L. Edward Lashman, Chairman of the Social Service Committee of the District officiated on behalf of the District Grand Lodge.

Detailed reports, statistical and financial, were presented by the officers of the two lodges, which reports were audited and found correct. HANUKAH BALL BY B'NAI B'RITH LODGES OF HOUSTON.

The largest and most enjoyable social function given by Houston Jewry was a Hanukah Ball held on Sunday evening, December 16, 1917.

Many soldiers and civilians were present long before the doors were opened. While the affair was given for Jewish soldiers there was no distinction made and all men in uniform were admitted free.

The grand march, scheduled to take place at 8:45, was not held until almost an hour later. The assembled dancers were probably wondering what delayed the dance when the clear notes of a bugle floated across the hall. The last note had hardly died out when, in obedience to an order issued by several lieutenants stationed about the auditorium, the vast assembly of soldiers formed in a double line and to the tune of a rapid march, went through maneuvers that drew applause from the civilians. After marching around the floor the men came down the center of the cleared space in solid formation and stood at attention while the band softly played the strains of "The Star Spangled Banner."

The audience cheered until the last note of the national air had been played. Following three dances the grand march was held. Led by Captain Geo. U. Lipschultz and Miss Minette Bonart, the entire assemblage marched around the auditorium after which the regular dance commenced.

Jake H. Sam, head of the arrangement committee, and a corps of assistants made the dance one to be long remembered by all present. No strangers could be found after the dance had been in progress a short while, as a floor committee composed of 16 members, headed by Dr. L. J. Spivak, made it their duty to see that everyone was acquainted with everyone else.

Refreshment booths were on every hand. Mrs. Paul Lang headed the refreshment committee and was assisted by about 40 women.

It is estimated that besides entertaining 300 soldiers free that the ball will net about $300 for the Houston Branch of the B'nai B'rith Soldiers and Sailors Welfare League.

HOUSTON, TEXAS.

At a mass meeting held on Thursday night, Dec. 20, 1917, at Concordia Club, it was decided to form the Jews of Houston into an organization to be known as the Houston Branch of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League of the B'nai B'rith. This name was necessary by reason of the fact that permits could not otherwise be obtained to visit the camp and do our work in the camp, and it must be understood at the outset that while this is the outgrowth of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, it is an organization of the entire Jewish population of the city, irrespective of membership in the B'nai B'rith. The following officers were elected: Meyer C. Wagner, chairman; Jules Hirsch, treasurer; Edgar Goldberg, secretary. As chairman, Mr. Meyer C. Wagner was authorized to name the chairmen of the respective committees: Hospital Committee, Mrs. I. G. Gerson; Home Entertainment, Mrs. L. It is not well to gauge our courtesy by that of the one on whom it is bestowed. To be polite to the polite abrupt with those who are gruff, and positively discourteous to the rude, i to be a chameleon, at the best. Th only kind of courtesy worth possessing is that which, like the sunshine, falls on the just and the unjust, and sheds it beam impartially on all.

VI.—REFORM

Religion is essentially an idealism. It will, therefore, necessarily occur in the development of all religious institutions, that practical conditions conflict with principle. In such case, the principle will either be ignored, or it will have to be stated that the imperfection of our human nature does not always allow our principles to be carried into practice. We find such instances all through our religious literature, either accepted as a matter of fact or admitted in theory. R. Ame, a rabbi of the fourth century, calls people to assist in putting out a fire on Sabbath. His contemporary Abbahu uses a sedan chair on Sabbath, and does not attempt to excuse it from a legal point of view. He merely says, "I have to husband my physical resources in my advanced years". About a hundred years before his time R. Hiya lays down the principle that we must not make the fence more important than the garden. In other words, the law must not be so interpreted as to make the letter more important than the spirit. One of the leading French rabbis of the twelfth century, R. Jacob Tam, a grandson of the famous Rashi, discusses the question whether it is permitted to wear jewelry on Sabbath. It will be remembered by those who know orthodox practices, that on Sabbath we must not carry anything which is not part of our wearing apparel. R. Tam therefore declares it prohibited to wear jewelry, but he says at the same time, that it is better not to prohibit it to women, because they would not obey the injunction. This is in harmony with the Talmudic principle to allow infringements of the religious law, rather by silent toleration than to invite overt acts of disobedience by rigorism. R. Tam belonged to a large school of Talmudic authorities, whose seat was in northern France, chiefly in the province of Champagne. These rabbis, called Tosafists, are usually very rigorous in the enforcement of the law, but even they laid down principles which expressed latitudinarian views. Thus, they say, the Talmud has given laws which must be applied according to local conditions, and they go even so far as to attribute to the rabbis the right to set aside a Mosaic law.

Instances of the application of this principle are so numerous that only a few shall be quoted to demonstrate that they are found in all ages, and in all countries, and—which is the main point—that they are expressed by people of unquestioned orthodoxy. One of these men is R. Asher, a German, who spent the latter part of his life in Spain, and is a champion of rigorism. Even he, however, finds an excuse for the neglect of the old mourning custom, which requires that the bed on which a person died be turned upside down during the week of mourning. He declares in a way which is very much analagous to modern ideas, that non-Jews would consider it superstitious. Moses Isserls, a Polish rabbi of the sixteenth century, who punctiliously notes in his glosses to the Schulhan Aruk, the most insignificant customs, and declares that we must never ridicule an ancient practice, allows people to wear their shoes on the Ninth of Ab, when they have to pass a street inhabited by Christians. A younger contemporary of his, Joseph Hahn, who lived in Frankfurt am Main, takes issue with this laxity in defining the law, but even he says that the Talmudic law, which prohibits that anyone who possesses 200 Drachmae (about $40) must not take charity, does not apply to our age, when the value of money is greatly reduced. A commercial law of the Talmud on the right to recede from a business deal is too complex for our purposes to be fully explained. Suffice it to say, that it was openly disregarded in the jewelry business, which was the occupation of many Jews of Altona. Rabbi Ezekiel Katzenelnbogen, who was rabbi there in the first half of the eighteenth century, frankly declares that the business practices of his congregation are contrary to the laws of the Talmud, but he avows with equal frankness that under the conditions as they exist in his day these laws cannot be put into practice. Moses Sofer, who in the first half of the nineteenth century represents uncompromising orthodoxy, discusses a question of the Erub, which again is too intricate to be explained here, besides being unnecessary for the understanding of the principle which we wish to explain. It is sufficient to state that Moses Sofer declares a Talmudic law was given under the supposition that Jews should live separate from non-Jews, but that this object is impossible of realization in our days. Equally important is a decision rendered by Isaac Elhanan Spektor, rabbi of Kovno, the undisputed leader of the orthodoxy in Russia during the second part of the nineteenth century. Rabbi Isaac Elhanan discusses the question whether the widow of a man who perished at sea may remarry. According to Talmudic law such a marriage is impossible, unless the body was recovered and identified. But, says Isaac Elhanan, this law was given for a time when there were no post and telegraph offices, and newspapers, and a man might have saved himself to some Robinson island, from which he could not communicate with the outside world. In our days, however, this possibility is excluded, and it may, therefore, be presumed that the man is dead. These cases have been stated in order to define our subject. They are liberal tendencies in the application of religious ideas, but are not reform, because they do not represent a conscious deviation from the authority of the law. As long as religious authority is considered binding in theory, a deviation in individual instances does not constitute reform.

In Jewish religion it is somewhat difficult to find the starting point for religious reform, because our literature deals chiefly with law, and very little with a definition of faith. We had no church councils which formulated the belief of Judaism, and when individual authorities tried to do so, the masses, trained to understand religion as a line of conduct, took little interest in it. We can, however, not deny that deviations from accepted beliefs by prominent religious authors, show the tendency of the time. In this respect the bold statement of Elijah Levita, that the vowel points and accents in our biblical texts are of late origin, is of considerable importance. Elijah Levita (1479-1547), a native of Neustadt an der Aisch, Bavaria, spent a great part of his life in Italy, where he was engaged as literary adviser of Hebrew publishing houses, and as teacher of Hebrew to Christians. This was the age of the Renaissance, which we might briefly define as the method not to accept anything on authority, but to examine all accepted beliefs on the ground of the original sources. This method naturally led to the study of Hebrew as the original language of the biblical writings. Many prominent Christians, both ecclesiastic and secular scholars, devoted themselves to this study. Such men were naturally interested in questions which the average rabbi of that time did not care to examine. Levita became interested through his pupils in the history of the biblical text, and he arrived at the conclusion that the text as we possess it was "edited" even after Talmudic times. To the superficial observer, this would be a matter of no consequence. It will, however, elucidate the problem at once, if we point to the passage of Ecclesiastes 3:21, which in the usual versions is translated: "Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth"? This translation follows the text with the vowel points as we possess it. Granting that these vowel points were added many centuries after the book was written, and we would change them now so as to suit the context better, the author of Ecclesiastes would have said, "Who knoweth whether the spirit of man goeth upward, and the spirit of beast goeth downward"? In other words, according to Levita's theory, if applied to this case, the author of the book, who is supposed to be King Solomon, doubted whether there is any essential difference between the soul of man and beast, while according to the text, as it was altered centuries afterwards, he was made to say that the soul of man and of beast presents a mystery.

It was said before that the average Jew, including the man of learning, took very little interest in dogmatic questions. So Levita's theory aroused no opposition. It was somewhat different with a younger contemporary of his, Azariah Dei Rossi (1511-1578), a native of Italy. Dei Rossi lived in Ferrara, when a terrible earthquake, Nov. 18, 1572, laid the city in ruins. The inhabitants fled in all directions and finding shelter in farmhouses in the vicinity of the city, Jews and Christians lived in closer contact. As was natural, the religious significance of the earthquake was discussed. This led to the examination of the conflict between religion and science, and in the course of the conversation between the rabbi and the priest, various other rabbinic views on science and history came up for discussion. Dei Rossi, who, like all cultured Italian Jews, knew Italian and Latin, was better equipped for the task of a critical examination of Talmudic views than the average Polish or German rabbi of his time. This was a time also when the Copernican system had upset the fundamental principles of the mediaeval conception of the universe. Dei Rossi arrived at the conclusion that the Talmud, teaching that the earth is in the center of the universe, and that the sun is a planet, was untenable. Instead of doing what others did, who tried to harmonize these conflicting views, Dei Rossi frankly declared that the Talmud is no binding authority in secular matters. He supported his theory with numerous quotations, proving that the notes on history found in the vast Talmudic literature are in hopeless contradiction with facts ascertained by undisputed historic sources. The conclusion at which he arrives is the following: Our ancient rabbis were men of high intellectual standing, and as such generally superior to their age, but they are authority only when they speak of religion. In all secular matters they are merely voicing the views of their own age, and are in no binding authority. This was a rather bold statement in those days, and when Dei Rossi in 1574 published these views he aroused considerable opposition. The representative of strictest belief in authority, Joseph Caro (1488-1575), the author of the Schulhan Aruk, then 86 years old, was shocked. He proposed to send a circular to all prominent rabbis of the world, asking their co-operation in the condemnation of these heresies. Death prevented him from carrying out this plan. Judah Loew Ben Bezalel (c. 1530-1609), then rabbi of Prague, now better known through legend than as a writer, actually had copies of the heretical book burned in Prague, and in a book severely condemned the man who dared to set the authority of heathens above that of Jews. Italian rabbis imitated the example set by the Pope in the index, and none was allowed to read this book unless he received permission from three rabbis. A copy of the work bearing on the flyleaf such a permission from rabbis of the eighteenth century is still extant in the library of Parma.

The indifference to a dogmatic presentation of Judaism showed itself even in this case. The general Jewish public did not take any interest in the whole controversy. It, after all, did not touch their religious life, which was concerned with Sabbath observance, dietary law, mourning customs and all these regulations of daily life and synagogue practices, which were not touched by the question whether the views of the Talmud on astronomy are in harmony with the Copernican system, or whether what the Talmud reports of Alexander the Great and Julius Caesar or of the origin of Targum Onkelos, the Aramaic translation of the Pentateuch, is tenable or not. A man who was a child when Azariah Dei Rossi's book appeared took a bolder step. Leon Modena (1571-1648), rabbi of Venice, not only attacked Cabbala as fraud and folly, but went so far as to declare that the rabbinical interpretation of Jewish law was in contradiction with the Mosaic law and its divine intentions. He also criticized rabbinical law as being engaged in trivial things that are unworthy of serious consideration, and often morally and aesthetically objectonable. Sabbath observance and prayer are tedious, and in their endless ramifications rather destructive of a truly religious spirit. The rabbi who naturally lived as a conforming Jew did not dare publish these heresies in his lifetime, although he used the caution of presenting them as the questions of an infidel submitted to him. Such infidels certainly existed in those days, as we know from the tragic history of Uriel Acosta, who, having escaped from the Inquisition in Spain and settled in Amsterdam, found that the rabbis were not a bit less fanatic than the Dominican friars of Spain. He died as a suicide in 1647, and it may be presumed that he had a number of sympathizers, who, preferring a quiet life, were not as frank as he in the statement of their opinions. At the time of his death his townsman, the celebrated philosopher, Benedict Spinoza, was a boy of fourteen. There is no proof that the scene in Karl Gutzkow's tragedy, "Uriel Acosta," which presents Spinoza as a disciple of Acosta is based on history. But there was certainly some rationalism in the atmosphere of the cultured Sefardic community of Amsterdam, and of its sister communities elsewhere at that time. The trustees of the Portuguese congregation of Hamburg, as the minutes of the congregation show, asked in 1655 the rabbis to find some means by which the Levirate might be obviated. This law was a heavy burden on widows. It requires that a childless widow should not marry unless the surviving brother of her husband released her by the ceremony of Halizah. This ceremony was originally introduced for the sake of compelling the family of the husband to assist the widow. In the course of time it had degenerated into an opportunity for blackmailing.

We find no decision of this question, but it is quite significant that in the same environment at the same time already complaints about the disregard of some rabbinical laws, like the prohibition of drinking wine, of non-Jews and of shaving are heard. These complaints are not limited to the more progressive Portuguese congregation, but are found in German congregations just as well. It seems that in general people moved along the line of least resistance, and while not denying the validity of the rabbinical law in principle, would disregard it in cases in which it was particularly burdensome. Even the above-named Judah Loew Ben Bezalel condemns as early as the end of the sixteenth century some sinners who would drink wine of non-Jews, and even eat fish, thinking that it was permitted because it did not require Shehitah. We can easily understand the situation. The Jew as a merchant traveled considerably, and often had to go for weeks without solid food. Nature asserted itself, and while tradition was sufficiently strong to keep him from eating meat that was not kosher, he would allow himself a glass of wine or of milk, and even go so far as to eat fish. This laxity became so frequent that Nathan Spira, a Polish rabbi, who officiated for a time in Germany, published in 1620 a pamphlet on the prohibition of wine of non-Jews. A rabbinical convention held in Frankfurt in 1603 passed resolutions against such law breakers, and a great many congregations added to their ritual a special prayer to be recited every Sabbath for those who strictly adhere to the rabbinic law, and drink neither the wine nor the milk of the Gentiles. It does not seem that this frequent warning had a great effect, for Rabbi Jair Hayim Bacharach of Worms (1636-1702) bitterly complains at a contemporary rabbi who refused to discipline such a law breaker on the ground that we cannot afford to be so strict in our days and by rigorous discipline we might drive the liberals out of the Jewish fold altogether.

Similar was the laxity of people in their disregard of the law, which prohibited the use of a razor. The Jewish merchant or banker, who traveled a great deal, or came into contact with the highest circles of society, including princes and kings, did not wish to be singled out as a Jew by his beard at a time when every man of his class was smooth-shaven. There was indeed a way of obviating the law by using clippers or a salve, but this was not always convenient, and so progressive Jews used a razor. We find, as stated before, such complaints in the minutes of the Portuguese congregation of Hamburg in the seventeenth century, and in the eighteenth century R. Ezekiel Landau of Prague (1713-1793), allows people to remove their beard with salve on the semi-holy days of the Passover and the Sukkoth festival, on the avowed ground that the enforcement of the prohibition might prove an additional motive to disregard the prohibition of the razor. It is worth while noticing that his liberal interpretation of the law resulted in strong opposition, voiced not only by the rabbi of Amsterdam, a representative of the Polish school, but even by Italian rabbis.

The habit of the Jews to express their liberalism in the interpretation of the law, could not continue without occasionally raising the question as to the validity of certain religious beliefs. We have seen it in the case of Azariah Dei Rossi, who denied the authority of the Talmud in question of science, and in the case of Leon Modena who denounced Cabbala as fraud and as a caricature of religion. The latter idea must have found various followers, for in the seventeenth century a number of Polish rabbis issued a strong anathema against anyone who would deny the authority of Cabbala. In this respect, however, the opinions were divided. One may say that in general, the Polish and the Italian rabbis were enthusiastic believers in mysticism, while the German rabbis, as a rule, would assume a non-commital attitude, declaring that Cabbala is too profound a study for the average mind, and should better be left alone, especially in an age of mental decline as according to the usual conception in religious circles is always the age in which the author lives. This negative and non-committal attitude attained greater force when through the mystic movements of the seventeenth century, culminating in the Messianic pretensions of Sabbatai Zebi in 1666, the danger of this movement became obvious. The Messianic pretender and many of his followers converted to Islam, and in spite of this apostasy, a considerable number of Jews still believed in him. Some of them driven by their expectations of his reappearance went to Palestine, and facing starvation, most of them apostatized, and so it was evident that mysticism was a grave danger to Judaism.

The negative attitude naturally led to criticism of the principles and to open opposition to certain traditional practices that had crept into Judaism. One case, which is not sufficiently known, is reported from Italy in 1722. A school principal in Goerz objected to a prayer which invokes the aid of the angels in obtaining forgiveness for Israel. It forms part of (Selihot) the liturgy for the days of penitence, beginning some time before New Year, and continuing until Yom Kippur. The extent of these days is different in different countries. The German and Polish Jews begin these services which are held before daybreak on the Sunday preceding New Year. The anthem which was considered objectionable, begins: "Ye who lay our invocations before the throne of God, ye who bring our tears before Him, ye who bring our sighs before Him, use your best efforts to obtain mercy for us". This prayer, which is not found in all rituals, is quite old. It is mentioned already in early Middle Ages, and objections to it are found as early as the thirteenth century in the works of Jacob Anatol, a philosopher of the thirteenth century. The above named teacher, filling a position in Goerz, a congregation formed by German Jews, who, however. in the course of time, had adopted the Italian language, openly demanded that this prayer expressing the belief in mediators between God and man, should be omitted from the ritual as clearly un-Jewish. A strong support for his contention was the undeniable fact that this prayer was not found in the ritual of the Italian Jews. Still, even the Italian rabbis, among them Samson Morpurgo of Ancona, one of those whose signatures are found on the flyleaf of Dei Rossi's heretical book, strongly denounced any attempt at deviation from the local Minhag. There is a great deal of scholarship wasted on the question, but the real motive of the question is that the principles of religious authority require the upholding of tradition in order to maintain the authority of the past. This is not confined to Judaism. The Catholic church shows a similar policy. She requires, for instance, that her priests should be smooth shaven, and attempts to have this rule altered were persistently refused by Rome, although there can be no doubt, as portraits show, that popes wore beards as late as the sixteenth century, and even now Oriental churches and some monastic orders require that the priests grow beards.

The most interesting experiences in the study of religious history are those that show how liberalism arises often through the desire to uphold the traditional standard of religion. The mystic movements previously referred to had created a number of eccentricities which militated against traditional Judaism, which in the beginning had tolerated, and even encouraged, mysticism. The strongest evidence of the danger to traditional orthodoxy was the also above referred fact, that many of the mystics became apostates. Even when they did not apostatize, their conception of religion, which laid more stress on emotionalism than an ritual observance, created conflict with orthodoxy. Personal reasons added to occasional friction, and from this point of view we have to consider the literary feud between two rival rabbis in Altona—Jacob Emden (1696-1776) and Jonathan Eyebeschuetz (1690-1764)—which lasted about twenty years. Graetz seems to overestimate the dogmatic side, though this cannot be entirely overlooked. It must be borne in mind, however, that at the basis of the whole controversy were some petty personal jealousies. Eyebeschuetz was for his time a pulpit sensationalist, given considerably to self-advertising. and it is quite certain that in our days he would have been a leader in local politics, and an advocate of radical innovations. In his day he claimed not merely to be a great Talmudist, which was expected of every rabbi, but he posed as a man of secular knowledge, although he barely was able to scribble his name in German characters, and as a Cabbalist in the sense in which this was understood. There was namely a difference between Cabbala as a theory, which might be termed as theosophy, and between Cabbala as a sort of Christian science. The mystics claimed that by charms that they wrote in mysterious words and characters, they could heal sickness, prevent dangers, and secure success in business and the like. Rabbi Jonathan who was born in Cracow, came as a child with his father to the little town of Eibenschitz in Moravia, from which town he retained his name, although he left it in his boyhood, having lost his father by death. He subsequently became rabbi in Prague, as it seems, not in an official capacity as member of the rabbinica college, but as preacher in a synagogue, and as head of a Yeshibah. During the second war with Prussia (1744), when the French army as allies of Prussia, invested Prague, he was elected rabbi of Metz, probably through the influence of some French Jews who came to Prague as contractors and sutlers, and there required a great reputation. In 1751 he was elected chief rabbi of Altona. There his troubles began. His rival, Jacob Emden, decidedly his superior as a scholar and as a character, proved that charms which the new chief rabbi had written, showed his belief in the fraud and apostate Sabbattai Zebi. There can be no doubt as to the charge. It is, however, doubtful to me whether Jonathan Eyebeschuetz actually had, as Emden impudes to him, the intention to convert all Jews to this belief, and indirectly to Christianity. He was probably a sensationalist, who posed as a theosophist and worker of miracles. It is a great pity that intelligent outsiders, like Moses Mendelssohn, who visited Hamburg at that time, and whose wife was a daughter of a trustee of the congregation, or his co-oworker, Herz Wesel, who was a disciple of Eyebeschuetz, did not give us their impression of the controversy. One important literary fact resulted from this petty con gregational squabble. Emden, who had a fine historic mind, collected documents on the history of heresies, preceding his time, and in the course of his studies became convinced that the Zohar, the highest authority for the mystics, was to a considerable extent forged by mediaeval authors, among them Moses of Leon, a Spanish Jew of the thirteenth century.

It is worth while remembering that Emden did not deny Cabbala altogether, nor that the Zohar in parts was a sacred book, but by his declarations that it had been forged by intentional fraud, he opened a new path for the criticism of religious sources, and for the examination of generally accepted religious views.

*The author is fully conscious that the B'nai B'rith has for its object "to unite Israelites". It may, therefore, be necessary to state that this attempt to sketch the origin of the reform-movement is not as a plea for it, nor as an attack on it. It is merely an attempt to present its historic development. The author also refrained from giving any references to the sources, partly because of the economy of space, and partly because the general reader, for whom these sketches are intended, will rather be disturbed than helped by bibliographical references, which could only be intended for the specialist.

PAMPHLET ON BIG BROTHER MOVEMENT ISSUED BY SOCIAL SERVICE BUREAU OF THE I. O. B. B.

The salient features in the recent development of social service have been the change from the treatment of groups to the care of the individual, and from the giving of relief to the encouragement of self-dependency. It is not surprising that in the course of this progress the idea was conceived that a great deal more could be accomplished in the development of young boys into decent manhood, if instead of herding them in large numbers in institutions and then forgetting about them, each boy could be introduced to one intelligent man of broad sympathies who would take a real interest in the life of that boy, the sort of interest that he would be likely to take in his own younger brother. It is very timely and quite in the nature of things that the Independent Order B'nai B'rith, whose motto and whose international spirit inevitably include the idea of brotherhood, should, at the very beginning of its social service activity, place emphasis upon the Big Brother Movement.

In the beginning, the interest of the men who acted as Big Brothers was bestowed only upon those boys who had already come into conflict with the rules of organized society, the relationship of the probation officer and the accused boy who was ordered by the court to report to him. Today it is being generally recognized that the boy is entitled to the advantages of a Big Brother to whom he is not bound by any order of court to report, but to whom he voluntarily goes as a friend. To such a Big Brother he is entitled to be introduced in a natural and informal manner before he has come into any conflict with the law.

Any statement of the relationship of the Big Brother and the Little Brother appeals to the common sense of the average man as being so natural, that in the very simplicity of the idea there is danger—that danger is the assumption that any man is equipped and fitted to assume the responsibilities of a Big Brother to any young boy. Simple and natural as the relationship must be between the Big Brother and the Little Brother, if good results are to be secured, yet it must be remembered that the entire development of the young boy's life is likely to be determined by the care with which the person who is allowed to take the responsibilities of a Big Brother is chosen. Therefore, it is impossible to over-emphasize the necessity for a careful selection of the Big Brother and the serious importance, after such a man is given that responsibility, of placing him under the supervision of a trained and experienced social worker.

Because the responsibility of a Big Brother is so serious and the methods of systematically assisting Big Brothers are not yet generally understood by the average layman, it has been thought that it might facilitate the development of the Big Brother Movement by the lodges of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith, if a plan were outlined for organizing and directing the movement. A pamphlet has accordingly been prepared formulating such suggestions as may most readily be carried into effect by the lodges. Copies of this pamphlet may be secured by writing the Director of the Social Service Bureau, Room 1228, Tribune Bldg, Chicago.

ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE.

At the last meeting of the Managing Board of the Anti-Defamation League, an Administrative Committee consisting of Judge Philip Stein, Judge Hugo Pam, Judge Jos. B. David, B. J. Samuels and A. D. Weiner was appointed to take up matters of importance as they arise from week to week. This committee will meet at noon each Tuesday at the Covenant Club. Mr. Lewis, the former secretary of the League, is now with the United States Expeditionary Forces in France. L. Edward Lashman was elected executive secretary for the Managing Board, to succeed Mr. Lewis.

A number of complaints were submitted to the Managing Board during the past month. In practically every instance the complaint was satisfactorily adjusted.

A notice in the "Keystone," a jewelers' publication, described a swindler as a Hebrew. The following letter was received in response to our complaint:

"Jan. 25, 1918.

"Anti-Defamation League,
"Chicago, Ill.

"Gentlemen: In explanation of the item of which you complain, I wish to state that these descriptions of criminals come to us from the Pinkerton agencies and police departments.

"You understand, of course, that the use of the word 'Hebrew' is because of racial characteristics which would aid in identification and does not imply any reflection on the Jewish faith. We appreciate your viewpoint, however, and will be much pleased to comply with your request as we would not think of publishing anything which would be a reflection on the Jewish people.

"We will have him censor these descriptions hereafter, so that nothing will slip into our pages by accident which would give offense to anyone.

In Nelson's Loose Leaf Encyclopedia, an article entitled "Physiography," depicts a so-called Jewish nose and indicates that this implies avariciousness. We received word from the publishers that in the next revision of the encylopedia this reference will be omitted.

We received word that a cap was being distributed by a merchant in Cincinnati, the cap bearing the inscription: "The Union Store—Honest Weight—Price and Quality Skins the Jews". In answer to our complaint to the Wm. Wrigley, Jr., Company, we received the following letter:

"Replying to your letter Jan. 25, we were rather surprised on receiving your letter, because we have not printed any caps for the past three or four years, and if this ad was printed on a cap furnished by us some time ago, then, we will admit that same was shipped and passed on by one of our clerks; otherwise, such an ad would not leave our office, because we would sooner do without the entire order than to print either caps or calendars with an ad of this kind.

"We agree fully with you that it is entirely wrong and we are more than willing to do all we possibly can to rectify same".

Judge A. K. Cohen, our Boston representative, took up with the "Boston Globe" the matter of an ad which appeared in their columns. We quote from the letter received by Judge Cohen.

"The Boston Globe has for years had a rule in its office, which is stated concisely in the enclosed proof of matter which I have just had set up and served on all our advertising solicitors and clerks who handle advertising.

"I do not think that we shall have any further trouble. Copy for the advertisement in question came in in the rush hours, and that is the only excuse the clerk has for letting it get by.

"I thank you for calling the matter to our attention".

The following is the notice distributed among employes of the "Globe":

"The Globe's rule for years has been not to print news, editorial or advertising matter which reflects on any race o religion.

"Of late, through carelessness, two advertisements reflecting on the Jewish race have appeared in the Globe.

A Tribute to Edward L. Heinsheimer

Late President of Board of Governors of the Hebrew Union College

By Rabbi Jos. Krauskopf, D. D.

Why a Memorial Service.

We are assembled in compliance with a venerable custom and in obedience to the promptings of our hearts to do honor to the memory of one who, before his passing on, impressed his personal worth upon his fellow-men. We are glad that we are permitted to contribute our mite in perpetuating a custom and a memory as beautiful as those which have brought us together today. We feel that our expression of our appreciation of the distinguished services the departed has rendered will, at the same time, impress upon us a sense of high obligation. It will infuse into us a spirit of emulation; it will encourage efforts to attain unto like excellence; it will deepen the consciousness that, when a man has given long and faithful service to his fellow-men, it is fit and proper that a public tribute be paid to his memory, that the story of his life be duly told and duly recorded.

Not to Bury, But to Praise.

Unlike the words which the great Bard of Avon used when, in a memorable address over the remains of a hero of ancient Rome, he makes the eulogist declare: "I come to bury Caesar, not to praise him", we may say today of our departed friend: "We come to praise him, not to bury him". His mortal remains have been returned to Mother Earth, a month ago; his noble self, over which neither the scythe of death or the tooth of time have the slightest power, that is enshrined in our hearts and minds today, as it was in the years that have passed, as it will in the years that are to come.

We are here to think of Edward L. Heinsheimer, to speak of him, to ennoble ourselves by dwelling on his noble life.

Danger of Over and Underpraise.

On occasions such as this one is apt, from affection for the subject of his eulogy, to use language which to the cold critic may seem extravagant. On the other hand, a dread of being thought extravagant in praise may lead to an understatement of the high qualities which we admired in the one we commemorate. It is difficult to do justice to the critical mind and to the affectionate heart, at one and the same time. The heart has a logic which the mind cannot understand; the mind has insight which is bared to the heart. To keep a balance which may be judged as unbiased by the one and by the other is, therefore, no easy task.

I feel the situation especially keenly as I am to speak of one who, for more than two score years, was a warm personal friend of mine, one with whom I associated, on terms of intimacy, in the days of our early youth; with whom I dreamed and hoped and planned in our maturer years. Only but a few days before his passing on, a letter received from him made amply evident that the friendship, that linked us when as classmates we started together on our ascent of life, held us bound even after both of us had entered upon its descent.

And I know that others assembled here, whose friendship for him was older and deeper than mine, who, by reason of greater nearness and closer ties, were privileged to associate and labor with him in closer intimacy all their lives, feel the situation even more keenly than I do. Their hearts want to see the warmest tribute possible paid to Edward L. Heinsheimer; their minds want to have nothing said and done but what genuine merit has justly deserved.

What Heinsheimer Was Not.

To answer the wants of both heart and mind, let us consider what Edward L. Heinsheimer was, and what he had achieved, to have deserved a memorial service, one attended by an assemblage of people as large and representative as this. What was the secret of the high regard in which he was held in his home city and throughout the land? What the cause of the general sorrow that prevails over his untimely death? No statesman was he, chosen for counsel by the Chief Executive of the nation or selected for high place by the ballot of the people; no soldier crowned with the trophies of war was he; no scholar honored with proud degrees from far-famed universities; no poet decked with bays; no orator whose eloquence stirred the passions of the multitudes; no preacher at whose lips the people sought their bread of life; no artist who attuned the souls of men to the true and good and the beautiful; no wizard of science who snatched from nature her secrets and harnessed them to the service of man; no captain of industry on whom thousands depended for their livelihood.

What Heinsheimer Was.

None of these was Edward L. Heinsheimer; and yet he was the equal of any of these, for he was a noble, useful man, and anything better than a noble and useful man God never created, unless it be a noble, useful woman.

A simple citizen was he, untitled in the books of heraldry, unrecorded in the books of learning, untrumpeted in the marts of trade or finance. A simple citizen of probity was he, one that made humanity the richer for having formed a part of it. His was not a complex character, one difficult to read; it was as open as the day. Wherever he went gentleness and kindness and modesty went with him. He was not one of the flamboyant kind, who herald their performances by trumpet blasts. No one could associate with him without feeling the power for good that invested his daily walk of life. He was a devoted son, an ideal husband and father. Busy as was his life, engrossing as were his cares, heavy as were his responsibilities, all cares were laid aside when he entered the sanctuary of his home, when at the side of his wife and children, when entertaining friends under his roof. His natural, unaffected hearty manner easily won the friendship of his guests, and retained it all their lives.

He was a man to be thought of when service for the good of others was required, and he was found ready whenever it was in his power to serve.

He loved the city of his birth, labored conscientiously to make himself and others worthy of it, and itself worthy of them.

A Patriotic American.

A patriotic American was he, one to whom citizenship spelled duty as well as privilege, duty to give freely of himself and of his means, as well as privilege to receive of its bounty, duty to safeguard by watchfulness and service the precious boon of political and social and religious liberty, which is our nation's sacred heritage.

A Loyal Israelite.

A loyal son of Israel was he, proud of its history, proud of its achievements, conscientious of his efforts to make his own life and that of others square with its exalted teachings.

President of Trustees of Hebrew Union College.

And more than all, his special distinction lay in the efficient, painstaking, self-effacing manner in which he discharged his duty as president of the Board of Governors of the Hebrew Union College, an institution designed and maintained for training young men to become leaders in Israel, expounders of its teachings, interpreters of its aspirations, disseminators of its truths, champions of its rights.

Mourned By American Israel.

It was his masterly self-consecration to this task, one of the most difficult in this unspiritual age, that made him highly esteemed not only in Cincinnati but in other cities as well. It was the signal success which he attained in his presidency that made the sorrow over his untimely death pass beyond the borders of his city and become nationwide. It was your recognition that your sorrow is shared in other cities of the Union that prompted your holding this national memorial service, that accounts for my presence and participation.

While I cannot but regret that not a better representative than I had been chosen to voice American Israel's sorrow, I cannot but admire your wisdom in having chosen a non-Cincinnatian. Any one of a dozen of your honored citizens, any one of your eloquent rabbis, any one of the learned faculty of the Hebrew Union College, could have voiced the national sentiment far better than I, because of their having been in closer contact with our lamented friend, because of their more intimate knowledge of his activities and ideals. Your choice of a non-Cincinnatian is the public expression of your recognition that Edward L. Heinsheimer served and benefited other communities as loyally and richly as he served and benefited yours.

Good Men Property of All.

Good deeds, unselfishly performed, no matter when or where or by whom, become the precious heritage of all humanity. No one knows how far and how long the influence of a good man extends. Even as the orb of day shines not for this or that place only, but brightens and warms all the earth; even as stars shine not for this or that individual, but gladden the hearts of all mankind, even as the tiny violet makes not only its immediate environment, but all the field the sweeter for its fragrance, so does no man engage in blessed work, be he never so humble, never so little known, but that all his fellow kind are, in some measure, the better for his work. Every man opening a roadway into the wilderness, every engineer throwing a bridge across an abyss, every smith forging an honest plow, every physician turning disease into health, every patriot freeing his land from tyranny, every martyr offering his life that justice and right may live, every teacher and discoverer going into lands of fever and savagery to carry liberty and light and love to those that walk in darkness, every one of these is benefactor of all men, is unconsiciously an immortal.

Israel's Debt to Cincinnati.

And few cities of our land have demonstrated this truth more forcibly than yours. Few cities have made so rich a contribution of good and useful men as yours. Few cities have exercised as large a cultural influence upon our people as yours. In many respects Cincinnati may be called American Israel's "Holy City". I have stood in the holy places of Jerusalem, Athens, Rome. I have visited the holy cities along the Ganges and the Nile. I stood in the presence of the holy shrines of the Shintos at Nikko, of the Confucians at Canton, of the Mohammedans at Cairo, of the Buddhists at Rangoon, of the Greek Catholics at Moscow. But, in none of these places, in the Orient or in the Occident, have I felt the holiness that awes me every time I visit the sacred places in Cincinnati. Every time I set foot upon its soil, a voice within seems to say: "Bow thy head, for thou standest on holy ground". Here lived and labored American Israel's greatest immortal Isaac M. Wise. Here labored faithfully along his side the illustrious Max Lilienthal. Here Mielziner dispersed freely to his adoring students from his bubbling font of Talmudic lore. Here labored that noble band of laymen who, large of heart, large of hope, with the noble, tireless, far-seeing, deep-feeling Bernhard Bettmann at their head, ranged themselves at the side of Wise with a zeal that was as holy as it was rare. Here stands the Hebrew Union College, American Israel's great sanctuary, the pride, the hope, of every Jew who looks back upon the glorious past of his people, and forward to the greater glory that yet shall be. Here its work is being carried forward in the spirit of its founder, under the leadership of the learned Kohler, the Elisha of our day upon whom the mantle of our Elijah has descended.

Nobly Succeeds Noble Leaders.

Foremost among the zealous successors of that noble band of laymen stood Edward L. Heinsheimer. Almost it seems as if Providence had destined him from his very birth for the work to which he consecrated half his lifetime, twenty years as member of the Board of Governors of the Hebrew Union College, and eight years more as president of that body. Almost it seems as if he could not have done otherwise, had he tried. Born of religious parents, his heart was attuned from earliest childhood to religious interests. Matriculated as a member of the initial class of the Hebrew Union College, his mind was given a yet stronger religious bent. Fortunate in his selection of wife, she helped to ripen a character that promised richly from the very first. Herself a daughter of Julius Freiberg, of him who, for many years, was most active as president of one of your great congregation, daughter of him who for many years was a zealous co-worker of Lilienthal and Philipson in all things appertaining to the promotion of Israel's cause; daughter of him who, in addition, filled for a number of years, with like efficiency, the office of president of the Executive Board of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, a position now filled with equal skill by her brother, J. Walter Freiberg, she brought into her own home the religious traditions of her family, kindled on her own hearth a religious sentiment that could not but exercise a large influence on a nature like that of Edward L. Heinsheimer.

Even Best of Men Replaceable.

There was great fear, when Wise entered eternal life, that the Hebrew Union College was doomed. That fear reawakened when Bettmann laid down the burden of his office. "A successor to Wise", was commonly said, "would never be found". "A successor to Bettmann does not exist". A worthy successor to Wise was found in Kohler; an able successor to Bettmann was found in Heinsheimer. The college has gone on from strength to strength, has entered a permanent home, one more beautiful than had probably ever been dreamed of by its founder. It has increased in students, deepened in scholarship, and widened in influence. All this, and more, it has done not only by virtue of the momentum that had been given it by Wise and Bettmann, but also by [illegible] labors and devotion of their [illegible] Kohler and Heinsheimer.

The choice of both [illegible] illustrates anew the truth that [illegible] is irreplaceable, that emergency [illegible] the man of the hour. When [illegible] of the hour required a Wash[illegible] was on hand, when a Woodrow Wilson was wanted, he appeared. When the Guardian of Israel took off the shoulders of Bettmann his robe of office, which he had worn with honor thirty-five years long, he found the shoulders of Heinsheimer prepared for the wearing of it. The latter accepted the responsibility not because he had idle time on his hand. His time was precious, and he knew that the discharge of his new duties would rob him of many an hour that could be expended to better personal advantage. And still on all sides we hear—until I fear it has become an accepted fact—that our age is material, and our civilization selfish. He did not ask himself: "Can I afford to accept the office"? "Will not my financial interests suffer by my acceptance"? The question with him was: "Can I afford not to accept the place"? "Has not my venerated teacher, my city, my people, deserved that I set aside personal advantage for public good?" Is it not my duty not only to accept the office, responsible as it is, but also to strive with all my might to make myself worthy of the trust reposed in me, unworthy of it though I am"?

His Service.

And he did what he pledged himself to do, far more than had been expected of him. To the promotion of the best interests of the college he gave himself with all his heart and soul and mind. He retired from business that he might the better devote himself to the duties of the college as well as to the philanthropic and civic needs of his city. He was friend and adviser to the members of the faculty of the college; he took a parental interest in each of its students. Scarcely a Sabbath but that he attended the chapel services, but that by his presence he infused in both faculty and students a deeper realization that the future of American Israel is largely centered in them.

Often, in recent years, when thinking of the time when the college was first started, in a basement Sabbath school room of Congregation Bene Israel, of this city, with a faculty of two voluntary teachers, and one paid instructor, with a library consisting of a dozen Hebrew prayer books, when the outlook was dark, and the prediction of failure loud, when Ed Heinsheimer with a few other boys, among them Philipson, Maurice J. Freiberg, Berkowitz and myself constituted the entire student body, often, when thinking, in recent years, of this small beginning, have I wondered whether he ever dreamed that the time would come when the Hebrew Union College would be as beautifully domiciled and equipped as it is today, when its graduates would occupy foremost pulpits in our land, would prove themselves worthy successors to distinguished predecessors? If he had never dared to dream it, he must have been all the happier to know that such a day had come.

His Reward.

It is possible that his zeal hastened his end, that, heedless of impaired health, he bore too long the burden of his office. But who can tell whether that same Providence, that had seemingly fitted him for the presidency from his birth, had not also decreed to call him from it at the time and place when and where the summons reached him. What we deplore as a calamity may by the powers above be regarded as his reward. It is given but to the fewest to be summoned from their post of duty in the manner in which Heinsheimer was called. It is given to but the fewest to be relieved of their duties before strength ebbs, before eye grows dim, before hand becomes palsied, and mind feeble, and body frail, before long-dragging years of helpless old age cast into oblivion every remembrance of noble service rendered in the prime of years and strength.

Thus was summoned Isaac M. Wise.
Thus was called Edward L. Heinsheimer.

Since, sooner or later, we all must die, nothing is more to be desired than being called home in the height of one's usefulness. It is better to march to the grave under flying colors than to totter toward it as a mere shadow of one's former self. As painful as it is to see a once sturdy oak become a prey to rot and decay, so beautiful it is to see the sun sinking beneath the horizon, undarkened, unhid by clouds, still painting the sky with a golden and crimson light long after he has disappeared.

People often have short memories. When a man's usefulness departs re-

THE SAGES

(PART I)

Tenth Essay in the Series of Historical Portraits of Jewish Leaders, by Rabbi Samuel S. Cohon, Chicago

Legend no less than history bears tesimony to Israel's passion for knowledge and wisdom. That, according to the Biblical record, the ancestors of the human race were tempted by the fruit of the trees of knowledge rather than by the fruit of the tree of life, indicates the high place assigned to mental culture in the life-scheme of the People of the Book. In their view, knowledge is to the mind what light is to the eye. Opening the mind's eye to the soul of things, it gives man wings to soar higher than the eagle, and endows him with strength surpassing that of the lion and the sea-monster. "Give me understanding that I may live", was the prayer of the Psalmist. Even so did the whole nation cherish the understanding of life's meaning, its purposes, and its duties, as the greatest boon. There is some ground for the Talmudic conceit that, of the ten measures of wisdom which came down from heaven, the land of Israel acquired nine.

Wisdom is the outgrowth of high mental and moral excellence. As practical intelligence, it is stimulated by the knowledge of facts and phenomena. It derives its chief power, however, from the inner faculty of judgment. Thus, men of little learning may yet display a quickness of perception and a subtlety of expression as well as a wonderful sense of humor. As far back as we can go in the corridors of time, we find man relishing pointed words, and laughing at comical acts and situations. In ancient Israel the keenest delight was taken in the subtlety of riddles, fables, and proverbs. Samson entertains his Philistine wedding guests with an original riddle. They, in turn, take it so seriously that they come to blows over it. The battle of wits aside from affording a pleasant pastime, often helped to transact serious business. Thus Jotham cut the ungrateful Shechemites and their king, Abimelech, with a sharp-edged satirical fable (Judges ix:6-20). Eve's daughters, too, knew how to apply the fruit of wisdom. Abigail soothed the offended David with her tact, and saved her household from destruction (I. Sam. xxv:24-31). The wise woman of Tekoa affected a reconciliation between David and Absolom by means of a clever parable and a bit of splendid acting (II Sam. xiv:1-20). Another woman by her counsel and cunning delivered her city from Joab's sword (II. Sam. xx:15-22). In the mouth of the prophets, popular proverbs and parables turned into ready weapons. Nathan's parable struck down David's sin (II. Sam. xii:1-10). The writing prophets filled their quivers with the sharp arrows of proverbial wisdom; and frequently fought against injustice and wickedness by means of popular adages and well-constructed parables (Isaiah v:1-7; Jer. xviii:1-12, xxxi:2-8; Ezekiel xvii, xxxvii, etc.).

They well understood that God reveals Himself to man in manifold ways. He manifests His will, as in a flash of lightning, to the human conscience, firing it with the prophetic passion for truth. He also speaks to the mind through the voice of reason. Wisdom, therefore, like prophecy, disclosed to Israel the vision of God. Wisdom personified declares:

Counsel is mine and sound wisdom;
I am understanding, power is mine.
By me kings reign,
The princes decree justice. . .
The Lord made me as the beginning of His way,
The first of His works of old.
I was set up from everlasting, from the beginning,
Or ever the earth was.
When there were no depths, I was brought forth;
When there were no fountains abounding with water.
Before the mountains were settled,
Before the hills was I brought forth;
While as yet He had not made the earth, nor the fields,
Nor the beginning of the dust of the world.
When He established the heavens, I was there;
When He set a circle upon the face of the deep,
When He made firm the skies above,
When the fountains of the deep showed their might,
When He gave to the sea His decree,
That the waters should not transgress His commandment,
When He appointed the fountains of the earth;
Then I was by Him, as a nursling;
And I was daily all delight,
Playing always before Him,
Playing in His habitable earth,
And my delights are with the sons of men. . . .
Happy is the man that hearkeneth to me,
Watching daily at my gates,
Waiting at the posts of my doors.
For whoso findeth me findeth life,
And obtaineth favor of the Lord.
But he that misseth me wrongeth his his own soul;
All they that hate me love death.
—Proverbs viii:14-15, 22-31, 34-36.

In Israel, where wisdom was so highly prized, the sages readily attained to a high position of leadership. At the height of their activity they took their place by the side of the priests and prophets as the moral and spiritual guides of the people. So great a silence did they compel, that their voices have resounded through all the centuries.

Israel's sages may not be compared with present-day university professors or professional lecturers. Their instruction was not given in class rooms, nor was it imparted in a formal manner. Neither were they concerned with systematic discussions of the arts and sciences. They differed also from the sages of other nations in antiquity. The wise men of Egypt were much concerned with portents of dreams and with divination. The Chaldean sages dealt with astrology and magic. The philosophers of Greece speculated about the nature and the origin of the cosmic order. Zion's sages dealt primarily with human life. While striving to perceive the glory of God and to understand the nature of His mysterious world-guidance, they massed the greatest part of their energies on conduct and on righteousness. To them the chief study of mankind was man in his relation to his own self, to the social order, and to God. They grappled with life's vexing questions, in order to produce the light whereby to order aright the affairs of man. To gather the true wisdom of life, they turned to the life of nature, of animals, and of plants, and carefully examined their own experiences as well as the experiences of the whole human race.

Unlike the prophets, the sages of Israel claimed no authority for their words by virtue of possessing supernatural powers. Their only appeal was to reason, to conscience, and to tradition. Their favorite medium of instruction was the Mashal, in its pungent, terse and aphoristic form. "The Mashal", writes Prof Genung, "was an enunciation of truth, self-evident and self-illustrative, in some pointed or concentrated form adapted to arrest attention, awaken responsive thought, and remain fixed in the memory. Its scope was broader than that of our word 'proverb', taking in subject matter as well as form. The Mashal broadened indeed in the course of its history, until it became the characteristic idiom of Hebrew philosophy, as distinguished from the dialectic method of the Greeks". (Article "Proverb" in the International Standard Bible Encyclopedia, Vol IV, p. 2470). The oldest proverbs as "the coinage of the popular mint", made current by popular choice, appear in short and simple sentences (I Sam. x:12; xxiv:13; Jer. xxxi:28). The later Mashal as the product of literary artists "borrowed the poetic parallelism, or couplet, which in two lines sets two statements over against each other by antithesis or repetition", and thus appears in "its most condensed and epigrammatic construction". (Ibid).

How the people welcomed the instruction of the sages may be inferred from the idealized picture of the generous sage, given in Job xxix. Young and old men, nobles and princes, eagerly listened. Their voice was hushed.

"And their tongue cleaved to the roof of their mouth,
For when the ear heard me, then it blessed me,
And when the eye saw me, it gave witness unto me . . .
I was eyes to the blind
And feet was I to the lame.
I was father to the needy;
And the cause of him that I knew not I searched out. . . .
Unto me men gave ear, and waited
And kept silence for my counsel.
After my words they spoke not again;
And my speech dropped upon them.
And they waited for me as for the rain;
And they opened their mouth wide as for the latter rain
I laughed at them, if they believed not;*
And the light of my countenance they cast not down.
I chose out their way (more correctly: I chose the way for them) and sat as chief,
And dwelt as king in the army,
As one that comforteth the mourners".

Of the sages whose names are imprinted in letters of gold on the pages of the Bible, none is more illustrious than that of Solomon. This king, under whose reign Israel reached the zenith of its national glory, has been universally acclaimed the wisest man to have swayed a scepter. Of him we read in the ancient record: "And Solomon's wisdom excelled the wisdom of all the children of the East, and of all the wisdom of Egypt, for he was wiser than all men. than Ethan the Ezrabite, and Heman and Calcol and Darda, the sons of Mahol; and his fame was in all the nations round about. And he spoke three thousand proverbs; and his songs were a thousand and five. And he spoke of trees, from the cedar that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall; he spoke also of beasts and of fowl and of creeping things and of fishes. And there came of all peoples to hear the wisdom of Solomon, from all kings of the earth, who had heard of his wisdom". (I Kings v:9-14). Many stories are told in the Bible magnifying his wise decisions and acts. That his wisdom was not merely political sagacity or practical shrewdness, may be gathered from the references to his "largeness of heart", and from his deep concern in religious matters, as manifested in his building of the Temple (I Kings iii:5-28; x).

His epigrams, parables and songs have, with but few exceptions, been lost. Nevertheless, tradition identified them with three books of the Bible. In the springtime of his life, he is said to have composed the Song of Songs; in his middle age, at the height of his maturity of judgment, he wrote the book of Proverbs; and in his declining years, disillusioned of royal pomp, of pleasure's lure, and of the sparkle of gold, of life's glitter and of the attraction of fame, he gave expression to his skepticism in the book of Ecclesiastes. While he wrote neither the Song of Songs—which is a collection of popular wedding songs of ancient Israel—nor the book of Ecclesiastes—which on account of its Greek tinge both in thought and in expression appears to have been written some six or seven centuries after his death—he in all probability laid the foundation of Hebrew wisdom. As Moses initiated the Hebrew system of legislation, and David the Psalmody, so Solomon stimulated the collection of the first Hebrew Proverbs, many of which he may have composed himself.

Later generations, however, honored his memory by making him not only the patron and founder, but also the author of all Hebrew wisdom. Even the Apocryphal books of "Wisdom" and the "Psalms of Solomon" were ascribed to this royal sage.

Solomon's magnificence has faded like a mirage; his imposing palaces have long crumbled into dust; his gold of Ophir and his throne made of onyx have vanished. Yet he lives in the heart of his people and in the heart of all mankind, as the king who sought to exalt his God, who prayed for an understanding heart that he might rule his people justly, and who spoke many wise words of truth.

The wisdom of the Bible is the outgrowth of many minds and of many centuries. The first great collection of wisdom which inspired many imitations both in Jewish and in general literature, is the Book of Proverbs (Mishle). This treasure of wit and wisdom represents the wealth of many minds Like the Torah and the Psalms, it may be described as "an accumulation that has come rolling down through the centuries and gathered size, variety and beauty, like a snowball". There is the classic nucleus of aphorisms harking back to Solomon and the sages of his court (probably found in chapters x-xxiv). To it is added the collection of "the men of King Hezekiah" (chapters xxv-xxix), of the age of Isaiah and Micah. In the book are further embodied the words of the otherwise unknown Agur, the son of Jakeh, in check of the mounting pride and pretensions of the learned (xxx). The closing chapter contains the precepts of a queen mother to her son, holding out to him the ideal of royal manhood; also an acrostic poem, in which the verses begin with the successive letters of the Hebrew alphabet, extolling the true virtues of womanhood. The introduction to the whole, displaying deep philosophic thought and expressed in graceful and fluent style, rich and tender in tone (i-ix), appears to be the latest portion of the book, coming from the Persian if not from the Greek period of Jewish history

The Proverbs began as the wit of a few men, and became the wisdom of the whole people. They may be well described as an "inexhaustible source of precious documents in regard of the interior, history, the manners, the opinions, the beliefs, the customs of the people among whom they have had their course". Lord Bacon aptly remarked that: "The genius, wit and spirit of a nation are discovered in its proverbs".

Rich in imagination, the proverbs of Israel's sages are still richer in practical truth, yielding a wealth of insight and instruction. Remarkably free from courseness and vulgarity—with which popular sayings are sometimes tainted—the Proverbs are rich in refinement and ethical inwardness and depth. These "tiny but well-rounded nuggets of speech" are not mere ornaments of literature. They are splendid tools in the upbuilding of character. Their axiomatic form cuts "and penetrates the knots of business and affairs" and challenges the hearer's attention; whereas their terseness and brilliancy give zest to the argument.

The Book of Proverbs forms a manual of practical ethics covering almost every phase of personal and social conduct. Besides the maxims representing common-sense prudence, seasoned with humorous and sarcastic turns, there are penetrating observations on human vices and virtues. The equality of men is announced (xxii:2). Justice, as the cement of human relations, is identified with righteousness and probity. It is the virtue of kings and commoners alike. By its side stands the virtue of kindness to man and beast. Prof. C. H. Toy observes that the association of "kindness" with "truth" (as elsewhere in the Old Testament) indicates that the element of justice may have entered into the conception of kindness (International Critical Commentary to Proverbs, p. 12). Even kindness to one's enemy is enjoined. Love is highly prized because it leads to peace. Education receives great attention. Knowledge is identified with virtue, and wisdom with religion. Like most treatises on practical ethics of ancient and even of modern times, the Book of Proverbs is addressed to men. Hence the curious fact to which Prof. Toy calls attention: "The exhortations to chastity are addressed to men only; the man is regarded as the victim, the woman as the temptress—women are never warned against men or against the general seduction of society". (Article "Proverbs" in Encyclopedia Britannica, Volume XXII, p. 508). If the "strange woman" is the object of the sage's warning, the shrew is the butt of his humor. But he is not a misogynist. He knows how to honor woman in her position as wife, mother and mistress of the house.

Strength and dignity are her clothing;
And she laugheth at the time to come.
She openeth her mouth with wisdom;
And the law of kindness is on her tongue. . . .
Grace is deceitful, and beauty is vain;
But a woman that feareth the Lord, she shall be praised.
—(xxxi:25, 26, 30).

The appeal of the sages is not to the Jew as Jew, but rather to the Jew as man. The individual soul is made the mirror for the reflection of universal experience. National issues, ritual regulations, Messianic hopes, and questions touching the state of the soul after death, find no room in these reflections. Their primary aim is to lay down precepts of universal acceptance for rational living on earth.

In the introduction to Proverbs, the purpose of the book is set forth in these words:

"To know wisdom and instruction;
To comprehend the words of understanding;
To receive the discipline of wisdom,
Justice, and right, and equity;
To give prudence to the simple,
To the young man knowledge and discretion;
That the wise man may hear, and increase in learning,
And the man of understanding may attain unto wise counsels;
To understand a proverb and a figure;
The words of the wise and their dark sayings.
The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge;
But the foolish despise wisdom and discipline." —Prov. i:2-7).

As shrewd observers of human life, the sages have much to say about its highways and byways. In balanced couplets and quatrains, they contrast love with hate, justice with wickedness, industry with idleness, wisdom with folly, reticence with loquacity, truth with falsehood; and frequently lay bare the secret springs of action Their observation about the ways, the aims and the motives of life, bear the freshness of newly plucked flowers. Even the smallest selection of these flowers of wisdom will suffice to show their varied beauty:

"Hatred stirreth up strifes;
But love covereth all transgressions.
(x:12).
When a man's ways please the Lord,
He maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him. (xvi:7).
The poor is hated even of his own neighbor;
But the rich hath many friends. (xiv:20).
Many will entreat the favor of the liberal man;
And every man is a friend to him that giveth gifts. (xix:6).
The rich man's wealth is his strong city,
And as a high wall is his own conceit".
(xviii:11).

The trouble with riches is that they "make themselves wings, like an eagle that flieth toward heaven" (xxiii:4-6). A good name and honesty in word and in deed, are more durable and more valuable assets. The foremost concern of man should not be the accumulation of wealth nor running after honor, but the culture of the heart and the mind:

"Above all that thou guardest, keep thy heart,
For out of it are the issues of life".
(iv:23).

A heart bent on evil is included among the things that are hateful to God. (vi:16-19).

"The heart of him that discerneth, seeketh knowledge;
But the mouth of fools feedeth on folly.
(xv:14).
A fool's mouth is his ruin. (xviii:7).
Death and life are in the power of the tongue. (xviii:21).
A soft answer turneth away wrath.
(xvi).
Pleasant words are as honeycomb,
Sweet to the soul and health to the bones". (xvi:24).

At times silence is more valuable than the finest speech:

"Speak not in the ears of a fool;
For he will despise the wisdom of thy words". (xxiii:16).

The sages have a sober word for the drunkard:

"Look not thou upon the wine when it is red,
When it giveth its color in the cup,
When it glideth down smoothly;
At the last, it biteth like a serpent,
And singeth like a basilisk". (xxiii:31-32).

Idleness no less than wine-bibbing and gluttony is man's undoing:

"The sluggard will not plow when winter setteth in;
Therefore he shall beg in harvest, and have nothing". (xx:4).

His field is overgrown with thistles and nettles, its walls are broken down. The ant of the field can teach him industry. She has no chief, overseer, or ruler; yet she provides her bread in the summer, and gathers her food in the harvest. (vi:6-11).

"Seest thou a man diligent in his business?
He shall stand before kings". (xxii:29).

The great tonic of life is cheerfulness:

"Care in the heart of man boweth it down,
But a good work maketh it glad. (xii:25).
Hope deferred maketh the heart sick.
(xiii:12).
The heart knoweth its own bitterness;
And with its joy no stranger can intermeddle. (xiv:10).
A merry heart maketh a cheerful countenance;
But by sorrow of heart the spirit is broken. (xv:13).
A merry heart is a good medicine;
But a broken spirit drieth the bones.
(xvii:22).
The spirit of man will sustain his infirmity;
But a broken spirit, who can bear"?
(xviii:14).

The pure heart is free from the spirit of vindictiveness:

"Rejoice not when thine enemy falleth,
And let not thy heart be glad when he stumbleth". (xxiv:17).

Restraint is one of the great virtues of life:

"He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty;
And he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city". (xvi:32).

Man must be strong in temptation, retain his personal chastity and preserve the purity of the family. To this end, he must not consort with evil-minded companions. Parents are advised to "Train up a child in the way that he should go,

And when he is old he will not depart from it". (xxii:6).

The old philosophy of education found expression in this precept:

"He that spareth the rod hateth his son,
But he that loveth him chasteneth him betimes". (xiii:24).

Parents are urged to bear also this maxim in mind:

"Chasten thy son, for there is hope;
But set not thy heart on his destruction". (xix:18).

Man's duties do not end with himself. As a member of the social order, he must labor for the well-being of his fellowmen by practicing justice. Kings and judges are particularly exhorted to maintain justice in the land, by protecting the weak and the oppressed. Not tyranny, but "Mercy and truth preserve the king,

And his throne is upheld by mercy.
(xx:28).
He that oppresseth the poor, blasphemeth his Maker;
But he that is gracious unto the needy honoreth Him". (xiv:31).

Charity is inseparable from religion:

He that is gracious to the poor, lendeth unto the Lord,
And his good deed will He repay to him.
(xxx:17).
"He that hath a bountiful eye shall be blessed,
For he giveth of his bread to the poor.
(xxii:9).
The merciful man doeth good to his own soul;
But he that is cruel troubleth his own flesh". (xi:17).
To do justly is joy to the righteous,
But ruin to the workers of iniquity.
(xxi:15).
In the way of righteousness is life,
And in the pathway thereof there is no death. (xii:28).
He that followeth after righteousness and mercy
Findeth life, prosperity and honor.
(xxi:21).
Righteousness exalteth a nation,
But sin is a reproach to any people".
(xiv:34).

Righteousness, however, is not the same as self-righteousness. Man can never say of himself:

"I have made my heart clean.
I am pure from my sin". (xx:9).

There is One higher to judge that:

"The spirit of man is the lamp of the Lord,
Searching all the inward parts". (xx:27).

The conviction that man moves in the ever-living presence of God, is the central doctrine of the religious philosophy of the sages. With no less intensity than the prophet and the psalmists they emphasize the truth of the divine government of the universe. (xvi:4, xx:24, xxi:1, etc.).

"The eyes of the Lord are in every place, Keeping watch upon the evil and the good". (xv:3).

Hence the sage strikes the keynote of the Book of Proverbs in the precept:

"The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom". (i:7).

Further:

"The fear of the Lord is to hate evil". (viii:13).

And again:

"The highway of the upright is to depart from evil". (xvi:17).

This is the sum total of religion. Hence the sage announces in prophetic manner that:

"To do righteousness and justice
Is more acceptable to the Lord than sacrifice". (xxi:3).

From these fundamental beliefs in the perfection of God and in the validity of the moral law, the sages derive the motive power for the highest as well as for the lowest duties of life.

"The path of life goeth upward for the wise". (xv 24).

It leads to the uplands of morality, to rapture and joy in the eternal.

The sages hold out to man the light by which to guide his conduct and find favor in the eyes of his fellowmen and of God. Encouraging frugality, industry, faithfulness, sobriety and justice, they give special emphasis to the culture of the heart and the mind. "Wisdom beginning as 'a prudence taught by observation of this world's laws", gradually grows into religion and is identified with religion. Thus the wisdom of man reaches its highest point in the reverence and love of God (xxii:17-22). Hence the sage calls:

"Trust in the Lord with all thy heart,
And lean not upon thine own understanding.
In all thy ways acknowledge Him,
And He will direct thy paths.
Be not wise in thine own eyes;
Fear the Lord, and depart from evil;
It shall be health to thy navel,
And marrow to thy bones.
Honor the Lord with thy substance,
And with the first fruits of all thine increase;
So shall thy barns be filled with plenty,
And thy vats shall overflow with new wine.
My son, despise not the chastening of the Lord ,
Neither spurn thou His correction;
For whom the Lord loveth He correcteth,
Even as a father the son in whom he delighteth.
Happy is the man that findeth wisdom,
And the man that obtaineth understanding
For the merchandise of it is better than the merchandise of silver,
And the gain thereof than fine gold.
She is more precious than rubies;
And all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared unto her
Length of days is in her right hand;
In her left hand are riches and honor.
Her ways are ways of pleasantness,
And all her paths are peace.
She is a tree of life to them that lay hold upon her,
And happy is everyone that holdeth her fast". —(Proverbs iii:5-18).

*This version is more in keeping with the serene nature of the sage than that of the New Translation, which following the old commentators, renders the sentence: "If I laughed at them, they believed it not," thus implying haughtiness in the sage.

B'NAI B'RITH WAR WORK

During the first year of the war, when something of the horror of it and the suffering caused by it became known, the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith raised a large sum of money and sent it to the countries of the allied nations and also to those of the Central Powers for the relief of the fleeing, destitute victims who, unhappily placed near the borderlands of the war, were the first to feel the devastating tread of the invading armies of first one belligerent and then another.

Now, since our own country is at war, it is bending its energies to make the lives of our own soldiers happier and to protect them against evil influences by establishing headquarters for them near the cantonments and camps, where they have the comforts of home, and by inviting them to the homes of the members of the fraternity, where they may have temporary relief from the hardships of camp and occasional touch with the refinements of home. This work has been fully approved by the War Department of our Government.

INSTITUTION OF B'NAI B'RITH LODGE IN SOUTH BEND, IND.

On Jan. 20, 1918, South Bend Lodge No. 824 was instituted in South Bend, Ind. The meeting was presided over by Brother Louis J. Borinstein, of Indianapolis, president of District Grand Lodge No. 2. Upon roll call 78 candidates responded and were initiated by the degree team, composed of the visiting Grand Lodge officers. Formal institution of the lodge was followed by the election of officers for the ensuing term and the installation of officers by President Borinstein. Various committees were then appointed.

The meeting was held at Hotel Oliver and was marked by much enthusiasm. Prior to the formal meeting there was an open meeting, attended by about 200 people. The meeting was addressed by Brother Borinstein, who held the audience spellbound for a long time discussing the various branches of activities of the B'nai B'rith Order.

MANY JEWS ARE HONORED IN ENGLAND

The New Year's honors contained a number of Jewish names which will arouse some interest. For the most part, the recipients of the honors are not very prominent in the Jewish community, but an exception must be made to this statement in respect of the Rev. Michael Adler, Senior Jewish Chaplain and also the Minister of the Central Synagogue of London, on whom the high distinction of the Distinguished Service Order has been conferred. Sir John Monash, of Australia, the only living English Jewish Major-General, has been created a Knight Commander of the Bath. Sir G. C. Mandelberg, a prominent Jewish citizen of Manchester, has been knighted, as has also Sir Sidney Lee, the well-known publicist and Shakesperian authority, who, although of Jewish parentage, has never been connected with Anglo-Jewry. The Companionship of the Bath has been conferred upon Colonel J. J. Leverson, C. M. G., and the Companionship of St. Michael and St. George on Sir Herbert Jessel, Bart., and Lt.-Col. H. E. Cohen, D. S. O. Ernest Schiff was given the title of Sir Ernest Schiff. These are the principal honors that have been conferred this week on English Jews. There are still others of less importance.

ROUMANIA SHOWS FAVOR TO JEWS.

About two hundred Jewish petty officers in the army were promoted to higher offices by the Roumanian government. It was also declared that all Jewish officers in the army will become full Roumanian citizens and will enjoy equal rights with the Roumanians.

The Jewish inhabitants of Ivitch were permitted to return from exile to their native town on condition that each one take an oath in the synagogue that he will have no communication with the military and that he would not even stop to speak to a soldter.

Daniel's Vision of The End

By Dr. Max L. Margolis

Written for the B'nai B rith News

A lady told me the other day that the women have taken to studying the Book of Daniel. Now the women have taken up divers activities, Red Cross work, food conservation (which works well everywhere except in the kitchen), and in particular knitting. Certainly more profitable a manner of spending one's leisure than playing bridge. If Jewish women are turning of all the books of the Bible to Daniel, they have probably caught the contagion from their Christian friends. With the Christians, the Book of Daniel has always stood in high favor. It is placed by them among the prophets. The orthodox Christian still believes that the chief function of the Hebrew prophet was to predict the supreme event in the history of Christianity and, according to the belief of Christians, in the history of the world, the advent, life and death of the Christ, his second coming, etc. There is no mistaking the profound influence which Daniel's visions have exercised almost to within the past century. Text books of universal history, Steinthal tells us, still operated at the beginning of the century with Daniel's four kingdoms, which were identified with the Babylonian, Persian, Macedonian, and Roman. And the scholar does not fail to point out that the story of the four kingdoms so interpreted was of eminently practical significance so long as there was a Roman emperor of German nationality. But also Jews throughout the dark period of the long middle ages, which for them terminated towards the end of the eighteenth century, occupied themselves with calculations based on Daniel's vision to ascertain the "end," which meant the advent of the Messiah, the gathering of the dispersed, the building of the Temple, events which were to be preceded by the final onslaught of the enemy of God's people, Gog and Magog. A student of mine who apparently had also taken to studying Daniel, has called my attention to the well-known commentator Malbim, who in his exposition of Daniel, figures out the time-limit of "a season, and two seasons, and half a season" to fall in the year 1913, just a little in advance of the beginning of the present world-war.

The Talmund and Orthodoxy in general frown upon "calculators of the end." Various motives play into this attitude. There is the feeling that the "end", which is in God's keeping must not be hastened. God alone may hasten it. As the Rabbis say, "if Isreal is worthy, the end will be hastened; otherwise it will come in its due season." There is also a saying in the Talmud, that the Kingdom of God, the fifth, which is to overthrow the four heathen kingdoms which preceded it, like all good things in the world, will come when it is least expected, when your mind is not on it. There is a parallel saying ascribed to Jesus of the same purport. He is impatient with those; who, like the zealots of his day, would snatch the Kingdom, bring it on by force as it were. There were snatchers in by gone days likewise. Haggai invested Zerubbabel with the dignity of the Messiah. He was a political Zionist, who sought to turn the constellation of political events to good purpose. Zachariah was more orthodox, and his admonition to Zerubbabel, that the Kingdom will be brought about not by force or might, but by the spirit of God, is still a favorite theme for sermons in reform circles on Sabbath Hanukkah. Zachariah was more concerned with the perpetuation of Judaism, and a high-priest with a hierarchy under foreign dominion was all he cared for. The plea was renewed by the Pharisaic emissaries sent to meet Pompey. The zealots were not to the liking of the spiritual leaders, the represensatives of orthodoxy. Akiba stood out singly when he acclaimed Bar Cochba as Messiah. The chief rabbis protested. Grass will grow on Akiba's grave, they said, and the Messiah would still be due. Rabbi Hillel, impatient with the Messianic yearnings, is responsible for the extreme pronouncement that Israel had no Messiah, for he was "eaten up" in the days of Hezekiah. The pious and naive Rashi, who as little as any orthodox rabbi, could part with the Messianic hope altogether, hastens to add the correction: Israel has no Messiah, for God will Himself redeem Israel. The Messianic hope was ingrained in the Jew. When a Messiah emerged, there have been many of them in our history, orthodoxy soon found out that he was indifferent, nay inimical to the legal Judaism as codified and interpreted by the rabbis. So when one came, that is proclaimed himself as such, orthodoxy denounced him and proceeded to wait for the next one, who would be the true one, while the others were make-believe, false Messiahs. But the "calculators of the end" persisted.

Daniel was no prophet. He was an apocalyptic seer. Now the older prophets were seers likewise. Lowth was the first among Christians to point out that the prophets spoke mainly to their contemporaries and of events well within their horizon. That view of course knocks the bottom out of the orthodox Christian opinion that the prophets predicted the events connected with Jesus. Nevertheless the thesis cannot be accepted baldly. The prophets do contemplate the "end of things", only that they conceive the end to be a near one, not too far removed from their own times. Moreover they do not speculate in exact figures. Jeremiah put the end of the Babylonian exile down to seventy years from this day. Daniel seized upon the prophecy. The restoration had come at the moment predicted, but the "end" had not come. For now the end was invested with all sorts of fantastic events, half mundane and half celestial. But even on a sober plane the restoration had lacked noteworthy elements. The Jews were not all in Palestine. The dispersion grew apace. Daniel lived in an era of persecution. The writer or compiler, there can be no doubt, was a contemporary of the stirring events under Antiochus the Incarnate. He saw the rise of the breakers of the covenant, the Hellenist Jews, who sympathized with the scheme to turn Palestine into an antiochian province. He witnessed the "abomination of desolution", the altar of the Lord dedicated to Zeus. He discerned the stirrings which led to the uprising of the Maccabees. He frowned upon them as impious. The Kingdom of God was to come from the clouds, miraculously. He was a thorough orthodox in his opposition to human means. Were he with us today, he would not account himself a Zionist even of the Mizrachi wing. He certainly believed that the "end", as he calculated it, would come in his day. Therein he was at one with the prophets of old. His calculations has proved a veritable riddle to commentators. Like a visionary, he cloaked his announcements in deliberate mystery. And so the veil will probably never be lifted. His method, however, proved epoch-making. Just as he operated with Jeremiah's seventy years of which he made seventy year-weeks, so others operated with his "season, and two seasons, and half a season". A well-known Christian rationalist has likened the process to that of a promissory note. When the time is up and payment is not made, the note is prorogued, renewed, an extension is granted. And so many a visionary after Daniel sought to extend the term, and by deft manipulation made the calculation to extend to future dates. Malbim is indeed a fair sample.

We shall not engage in calculations of the end. And though perhaps in a manner the end has set in, it has come indeed unexpectedly, shorn of all miraculous elements. The Mizrachi objected the other day when it was proposed that the Palestine Restoration fund should be named the Goullah (Redemption) fund. Orthodoxy is not satisfied with a Redemption minus the miraculous element. Perhaps they are right. Full redemption is a religious matter and partakes of an ideal character. That we may safely leave in the hands of Providence. Yet we are not devoid of the religious sense, we who see in our own times the beginning of the end. None of us would pretend to have peeped into God's workshop. Our piety bids us see God's work in the mighty movements of history. We hope that this may be the last war. It is the final onslaught of Gog and Magog.

Not that we believe that history revolves about the Jew and his destiny. We do not say that this world-war was set in motion that the Jews might be liberated. But we cannot help seeing that this world-war has brought about a situation which approaches the "end". Daniel's vision is being fulfilled, though not literally. Just as in his day the Messiah did not make his appearance, but nevertheless salvation was wrought through the mighty exploits of Judas the Maccabee on the very terrain now occupied by the British, so in our own day the Messiah may still linger, but a step has been taken which may hasten his coming, to use the rabbinic paradox, hasten it in its due season. We recollect the proofs advanced by the early lovers of Zion. Kalischer, for example, that the gathering of the dispersed, aye, even the building of the Temple, might anticipate the advent of the Messiah. Schechter recalled to our memory the saying of the rabbis that the Jerusalem above cannot be built until the Jerusalem below is restored. In other words, with orthodoxy we believe in the advent of the Messiah, which is to be a religious event, made noteworthy by an advance in religious teaching such as the world has not yet seen. But we hold firmly to the opinion that the spiritual unfolding of the potencies of the Jewish soul must be prepared by a solid substratum, by physical relief from intolerable conditions, by the liberation of the Jew, by the up-building of a Jewish culture in Palestine. Cultural Zionism so-called is impossible without the foundation of political Zionism. Nowhere does the spirit stalk naked, or it is a ghost. The spirit needs the body. A nation's spiritual rebirth can only rest on the recovering of the soil. The higher flights presuppose the firm ground whereon the most daring fliers may alight. And Reform, if it abandons an impossible position, may fall in line likewise. It also hopes in the advent of the Messianic era. Only the Messianic era must cease to be for Reform to be patterned after the Napoleonic scheme of emancipation. The Messianic era must be the time when mankind's highest spiritual hopes are to be realized. Surely no great spiritual truths can come to mankind by impersonal agencies. Reform will rehabilitate the personal Messiah as the future great teacher of mankind. And Reform may acknowledge its indebtedness to Zionism for having severed the national moments from the Messianic expectations. The national aspirations of the Jew are being taken care of in our own day. So far so good. But beyond there is still the vision of Daniel concerning the Kingdom of God, which must needs be of a religious character, and which indeed will come with the clouds, that is as a gift from Heaven, when in due season, long after the Jewish nation shall have been restored in Palestine, the Wonder-Child shall be born, the son of a Jewish mother, who shall have a message for the whole world, a message of the highest religious ferver, of faith in God as Ruler of the universe, of faith also in the perfectability of man, so that nations shall no more wage war with each other and the reign of peace will be ushered in. "Happy is he who waiteth".

NATIONAL JEWISH HOSPITAL CONFERENCE ON TUBERCULOSIS.

New York Sessions Attended by International Experts.

At a meeting held Sunday, Jan. 13, at the Hotel Savoy, New York City, the officers of the National Jewish Hospital for Consumptives, located at Denver, Colo., voted unanimously for a resolution presented by Mr. Samuel Grabfelder, president, to offer the facilities of the hospital for the men of our army to be used by the government in any way that will not interfere with the service now being rendered to civilian patients.

This meeting was followed by a luncheon in the hotel, at which Mr. and Mrs. Grabfelder entertained men and women of prominence.

Short addresses were made by Miss Lillian D. Wald, Dr. Henry Moskowitz, and Dr. William S. Friedman, Mr. Ben Altheimer presiding. It was announced that Mrs. Harmon August had turned over to the hospital a bequest from her mother of $30,000.

At the conference on "Tuberculosis and the War" in the afternoon, Mr. Charles H. Studin, president of the New York chapter of the hospital, presided. Colonel C. U. Dercle, of the French Army Medical Corps, on duty in the Surgeon General's office in Washington, was an important speaker. He gave the official figures recently sent out by the French War Department, showing that 86,000 cases reported as having been discharged from the army during the first year of the war because of the presence of tuberculosis had been reduced to less than 34,500 on re-examination. At present, in an army of millions, there are only 530 discharges monthly on account of the activity of this disease. Colonel Dercle said that the spread of tuberculosis among civilians is being guarded against most effectively in France by the establishment and maintenance of clearing houses for diagnosis and sanatoria for treatment throughout the territory of France. He also paid a tribute to the splendid work that is being done by the American Red Cross in this field.

A speech made by Dr. Charles J. Hatfield, of the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis, was particularly hopeful. He said that immense benefits to the fight against tuberculosis have resulted from the gathering together and examining of groups of men who otherwise might never have received needed medical attention. Through a system of tabulating names and addresses of men rejected by the army physicians because of tuberculosis it is possible to reach them for treatment and to prevent the infection of their families. He suggested that farms be established where those affiliated with tuberculosis might be self-supporting in surroundings where they could recover without becoming objects of charity.

Col. George E. Bushnell, of the Surgeon General's Department, stated that of the 800,000 men examined in all the branches of the service, less than 1 per cent have been found suffering from tuberculosis. "The United States army", he said, "is the best cared for in the world. It is unfair to the soldiers to spread a propaganda of fear because it is untrue. Nothing is more discouraging to the men than to put imaginary evils before their eyes, in addition to the real perils which they must face".

Dr. Alfred Meyer expressed his appreciation of the opportunity to obtain accurate information of a situation regarding which so many false rumors have been spread. He also thanked the hospital for its generous offer to aid the government in one of the important problems of reconstruction which have been brought to the surface by the war.

The meeting was closed by a plea from Miss Jane Addams, of Hull House, for an international movement of men and women to combat the dangers of tuberculosis. She asserted that the disease must necessarily increase throughout the entire world because of the food shortage brought about by the war. "Nationalistic ambitions", she said, "should fall before the humanitarian idea of feeding the world". Miss Addams was introduced by Mr. Studin.

"The great value of the work that this hospital proposes to do lies not alone in the direct help it will give the men," said Miss Adams, "but in the raising of standards for the care of the disease which will result in other institutions throughout the civilian population. I have visited the National Jewish Hospital in Denver, and I believe that there is none superior to it in the country.

"So many men are being brought together and examined with a special view to the detection of tuberculosis — there is a commission of doctors going from camp to camp for this purpose now — that it would seem a pity not to take advantage of the opportunity by extending the work to include relief for the civilian population.

"The National Jewish Hospital has done excellent work in this very field o spreading the principles of hygiene among the families of its patients".

It seemed to be the prevailing opinion that the facilities probably could be best utilized by the government if a colony of shacks were established for the use o the men of our army on the extensive grounds of the hospital in Denver, where climatic conditions are ideal for the treatment of tuberculosis.

Among those who attended this meeting was Ex-Ambassador Abram I. Elkus Mr. and Mrs. Jacob H. Schiff, and Dr. A Jacobi.

NEWS FROM LONDON

By Our Correspondent Dr. M. Epstein

London, Jan. 11, 1918.

Palestine, Jerusalem, the memories of the Jewish past, the hopes for the Jewish future—these continue to be the main topics of interest in Anglo-Jewry. So powerful is the force of fashion that men who before had little interest in matters like these have definitely given their support to the Jewish national movement. Gentiles have expressed their joy at the deliverance of the ancient city on Mount Moriah, and at the prospect of the re-establishment of the Jews there. Perhaps the following resolution, which requires no comment, is typical: "The congregation of Carr's Lane Church desires to express to the Jews of Birmingham and district their rejoicing at the deliverance of Jerusalem from the hands of the Turks, and their great satisfaction that the British government has given its promise to provide facilities for the establishment of a Jewish community on their own sacred soil. It is our earnest hope that Jerusalem may be held during time of war and retained in the peace which follows, and that the Jewish community in the Holy Land may revive the ancient glories of the kingdom of David. We venture to send to the Jews of Birmingham a message of greeting and congratulation, and to unite with them in a common rejoicing that places which are sacred to us both have, by the blessing of God, been delivered by British arms".

If Jewish aspirations have met with so much sympathy and support in this country, no less cordial has been the sympathy abroad. The cabinet ministers of several countries have come forth publicly to give the Jewish hopes their blessing. Herr Treub, the capable Dutch minister of finance, was among the first of European publicists to send a message. The Turks themselves have been moved to tell the world that they love the Jews and will continue to do so; Count Czernin, the Austro-Hungarian foreign minister, received a deputation of Austrian Zionists, assuring them that he had their cause at heart; and even Germany, through the mouth of a humble under secretary in the Foreign Office, has thought fit to utter honeyed, if belated, words to a number of representative German Zionists. These messages have been more or less fully reported in the press. Less noticed, however, is the report of an interview with M. Politis, Greek minister of foreign affairs, who said: "The establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine meets in Greece with full and sincere sympathy. That blessed day when the millennial aspirations of the Jewish nation are realized and when after so many sufferings that nation reconquers its liberty, that day we Greeks shall greet with joy, and quite satisfied we shall witness the triumph of a liberal spirit in the world and the destruction of all ancient prejudices against this noble, active and intelligent race".

The minister further declared that the formation of a Jewish national seat in Palestine, where the national genius of Judaism could expand freely, would constitute reparation for the flagrant injustice which had weighed for the past twenty centuries on the whole of humanity.

After alluding to the advantages of a Jewish Palestine, notably from the standpoint of a pledge towards universal peace, M. Politis concluded his discourse by observing that he thought, in the event of the great powers proposing a peace congress and the settlement of the Jewish and Palestinian problem, the Greek representatives would declare firmly in favor of a Jewish Palestine, the cradle of Judaism and its only national center. M. Politis hoped, however, that the Jews of Salonika, for instance, would not emigrate thither, as the Greeks would be sorry to lose such a hard-working and active body of the population. A Jewish Palestine, he added, would necessarily become an ally of Greece, and the similarity of their interests in the Eastern Mediterranean would draw the bonds between them still closer and render them indissoluble.

In a word, all the world is glad that the dream of two centuries appears to be coming true. Only a small body of British Jews are discontented, and there seems no prospect as yet of their acquiescing in the trend of history. Their league still lives, but reliable opinion declares that it only just lives. Its growth is exceedingly slow, and the number of its adherents is not large. A sound, healthy, common-sense view, which after all actuates the average man, is responsible for keeping people away from the league. It is not wanted; it is a little priggish; it strikes at the very root of the Brotherhood of Jewry—some such feeling, more or less unconscious, must be generally prevalent. Of course, the league is making frantic efforts to draw people to its net. So far it has issued two pamphlets, and a number of letters have been written to the Jewish press on its behalf. There the matter stands. The professed Zionist, meanwhile, are working hard; they have the ear of leading politicians in the country and the cabinet; and many people are thinking and talking of the great day when, after the war, those who desire to do so will journey to the Land of Israel to settle there. It is a significant comment on the ideals for which the world is fighting that the concensus of opinion favors Palestine under some form of British rule. The world knows what the British Empire stands for, the world also knows what the German Empire stands for. The chief rabbi's message to King George was thus a true expression of feeling. Dr. Hertz wrote:

"May it please Your Majesty—On behalf of the Jewish communities of the empire, whose ecclesiastical chief I have the honor to be, I humbly beg to congratulate your majesty on the world-historic victories of your majesty's army operating in the Holy Land.

"The occupation of Jerusalem, following so closely upon the epoch-making declaration of your majesty's government on Palestine as the national home for the Jewish people, causes the hearts of millions of my brethren to throb with deepest gratitude to Almighty God, Who alone doeth wondrous things.

"The House of Israel—that for 2,500 years has preferred Jerusalem above its chief joy—fervently prays that everywhere the heroic efforts of your majesty's forces may speedily be crowned with complete and lasting success".

It is just the fact not only that the British government has declared its interest in Jewish aspiration, but that British arms have conquered Palestine that helps to give the cause so much reality. Even among the so-called leaders of Jewry there are moderate men who, unable to profess themselves whole-hearted Zionists, are yet not unmoved by the call of the blood. It is said that the late Lord Rothschild was a Zionist in the sense that he welcomed a Jewish settlement of Palestine, provided the Turks could be dislodged. Today they are dislodged, and Lord Rothschild, had he been alive today, would either have been where his son is standing at present, or he would of a certainty have joined the moderate men who are negotiating with the professed Zionists with a view to arriving at a compromise. This striving for unity, this eschewing of opposition, is sound, and to be welcomed. Whatever the result, it will be preferable to the hostility of the League of British Jews which is terrified by shadows.

The Battalion of Russian Jews is growing apace, and every effort is being made to render the training of the men as comfortable as possible. There is a comforts committee to minister to their needs in the way of additional clothing, a recreation committee for providing games, books, etc., and a finance committee to collect the necessary means for all these things. No plans are as yet public as to the eventual destination of the men, but it is hoped that it will be Palestine. During the last month a monster entertainment was organized for the purpose of obtaining a sum of money for the regimental committee, and the whole enterprise was a great success. Ladies all over the country—Jews and Gentiles alike—are knitting socks and gloves and mufflers for Colonel Patterson's men. The colonel is deeply interested in the welfare of his unit, and he has been fortunate in enlisting the services of several officers who are distinctly forces for good among the men.

Meanwhile the war goes on and the central empires, though they have suffered mental and physical ills, still show no sign of any change of heart. Brute force alone they appear to understand, and the necessity for bringing them to their senses by means of brute force has brought Americans also to fight against them. But fighting is an accursed thing; it is twice cursed, it curses him that gives and him that takes. If fighting means victories, it also means suffering and pain. Naturally, the American wounded are treated in France and England, and some are already in hospital here. We heard of a Jewish patient at one of the London hospitals. He hails from Baltimore, and is very cheery.

The B'nai B'rith Diamond Jubilee and the 66th Annual Convention of District No. 1.

District Grand Lodge No. 1, Independent Order B'nai B'rith, celebrated the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Order with a jubilee at Temple Emanu-El, Fifth Avenue and Forty-third Street, New York City, Saturday night, Feb. 2, 1918. Three-quarters of a century ago the Order was founded in New York. It has spread throughout the country and has become a power for good in American life and has planted branch organizations around the world.

Governor Whitman brought the congratulations of the people of the State to the members of the mother district for what the Order has been, for what it has done and for what it has stood, and particularly for the devotion to our country it has always taught. He told his two thousand hearers that the patriotism the Order has shown since the die had fallen "war," has earned for them the esteem of the whole land. He said in part:

"It is particularly fitting that the ceremonies in connection with this event should be held in the City of New York, where in the year 1843 a number of Jewish merchants met at No. 450 Grand Street to discuss matters of Jewish interest. The subject which most engrossed their attention was the care of their less fortunate brethren.

"The purposes of these high minded citizens was such as to commend itself to their brethren, with the result that the work spread rapidly throughout this State and through the New England States, and within eight years District Grand Lodge No. 1 was established in this city. It was but a short time thereafter that lodges were organized throughout the United States and in many of the European countries."

The Governor then quoted from the charter of the Order its declaration of principles:

"The Independent Order B'nai B'rith has taken upon itself the mission of uniting Israelites in the work of promoting their highest interests and those of humanity; of developing and elevating the mental and moral character of the people of our faith; of inculcating the purest principles of philanthropy, honor and patriotism; of supporting science and art; of elevating the wants of the poor and needy, visiting and attending the sick; coming to the rescue of victims of persecution; providing for, protecting and assisting the widow and orphan on the broadest principles of humanity."

"It's a pretty creed," the Governor commented. "It's a pretty good foundation for any order of any kind, for the service of any land or people. But you serve a bigger purpose and teach a finer lesson than any of those enumerated in your charter—that of brotherhood. Whoever among you has thoroughly learned this lesson within your Order has been made ready for the great brotherhood—the brotherhood of man.

"I feel that this is your big opportunity and I am happy to know that you are indorsing it to the fullest extent. Your gifts of ambulance to the Red Cross, your offerings to the soldiers located in camps are all activities which win the warmest praise from your admiring fellow citizens."

Bro. Herman Asher, Past-President of the District, presided at the meeting. He spoke of the Order as "a body of Jewish men dedicated to the service of faith, the service of race and to the service of country." Dr. Joseph Silverman, Rabbi of Temple Emanu-El, and Past-President of District No. 1; Charles Hartman, member of its Executive Committee; Joseph Rosenzweig, M. P. Davidson and Judge Irving Lehman gave interesting addresses. Rabbi Herbert S. Goldstein delivered the invocation, and Bro. Rev. Simon Schlager of Temple Emanu-El conducted the musical program.

The District opened its sixty-sixth annual convention at the B'nai B'rith Headquarters, 2307 Broadway, Sunday morning, Feb. 3. Delegates were present from all of the New England States and from New York. The war work of the Order took up a large part of the deliberations.

The convention opened with a prayer by Rabbi Herbert S. Goldstein. President Rosenzweig then read his annual message reporting the work of the year. Among the activities he referred to the work among the soldiers and sailors and the placing of dependent children in Jewish homes.

Bro. Myron Sulzberger, President of the Board of Governors of the Home for the Aged, at Yonkers, reported over $20,000 spent last year for the care of old members who are no longer able to care for themselves, and whose families are in no position to maintain them.

The following officers were [illegible] the ensuing year:

Maurice P. Davidson, of Brooklyn, President; Charles H. Shapiro, of Bridgeport, Conn., First Vice President; Henry Lasker, of Springfield, Mass., Second Vice-President; Herman Asher, of New York, Treasurer; Dr. Bernard M. Kaplan, of New York, Secretary. The members on the General Committee are Joseph H. Ullman, of New Haven, Conn.; Joseph Rosenzweig, of New York City; Charles M. Stern, Deputy Attorney General, Albany, N. Y.; Col. Harry Cutler, of Providence, R. I., and Bro. Judge Abraham K. Cohen, of Boston, Mass.

MAURICE P. DAVIDSON.

The convention voted various sums to different charitable organizations, and adopted resolutions of thanks to the Governor of the State for his participation in the celebration, to Justice Irving Lehman, to the Jewish and daily press, to the Temple Emanu-El and to others who helped to make the celebration the success that it was.

The next annual convention will be held at Bridgeport, Conn.

The Grand Lodge closed its sixty-sixth annual convention by putting itself upon record as supporting the federal administration in the prosecution of the war in the most forceful way. The war resolution read:

"Whereas this country faces the most serious crisis in its history, and whereas the termination of this terrible war will affect not alone the future democratic institutions of our country but spells the fate of true democracy of the world and of humanity, and whereas our country is striving to see that justice shall be done and that a permanent peace shall ensue,

Be it resolved, that Grand Lodge No. 1 of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith hereby extends to the Hon. Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, its full co-operation in the carrying on of the war, pledges its support and the support of all its members of District No. 1, and

Be it further resolved, that we herewith pledge our faithful, our conscientious and our constant patriotic support in the service of the nation with a most abiding faith and conviction that we are on the side of the right, and that right—and not might—must prevail."

Copies of this resolution were ordered by the convention to be communicated to the President.

RIMMON LODGE, RICHMOND, VA.

Rimmon Lodge No. 68, of Richmond, Va., held its monthly meeting on Sunday evening, Jan. 27, 1918, in its vestry rooms at Temple Beth Ahaba. Yearly reports of the officers of the lodge were presented.

To the organization's "Honor Roll" the name of Morton T. Thalheimer was added, who recently received the commission of first lieutenant in the Ordnance Corps. Brother Edwin L. Levy, past president of the District Grand Lodge, conducted the installation ceremonies. All of the officers of the lodge for the year 1917 were re-elected to serve during the ensuing term.

MISUNDERSTANDING AND UNDERSTANDING

The allies are free to own up to several blunders of a military character. The Dardanelles, the Salonica front, Roumania, Italy—all are reminders of opportunities missed, of needs misguaged, of failing to act speedily and effectively at the right moment. And on the other side there have been made mistakes of a different character, political blunders, the staking of everything on the success of arms without taking into consideration the human side. Both sides are learning a valuable and costly lesson. The fewest statesmen, it seems, know how to keep their heads cool and in the midst of the turmoil of passion within and without to frame a policy based on wisdom, foresight and insight. Luck is a factor in warfare as in other human affairs. The unexpected may happen and in its course abet or hinder. In the long run it is unwise to build on fickle fortune which often acts like a boomerang. The Russian revolution was on the surface a feather in the cap of the Central Powers, a blow to the cause of the allies. The American press took sides against the extremists of Petrograd. The English prime minister was clearly out of humor, and he took no pains to disguise his feelings. Here and in England the impression was conveyed that Lenine and Trotzky were in German hire. Discrediting the other man's motives is an easy task. We were coming perilously near inciting the de facto government in the Russian capital against America. We have learned to change our tune. And our master has been the President of the United States. He at least has no axe to grind. He stands firm as a rock. He is wise, where his colleagues abroad are indiscreet. He alone has turned the American mind from misunderstanding to understanding. We may all depreciate the extreme position of the Bolshevik doctrinairism. We may express a doubt whether the endeavor to turn things in Russia upside down was necessary at this moment, whether certain improvements economic and social might not have waited. But it is idle to reckon with what might be and especially with what might have been. Facts are harder than theories. And things being as they are, there is left just one wise course, to make the best of an unwelcome situation. Already the same editorial writers who pounced upon the Maximalist regime are showing that they are capable of understanding the drift of things and of brushing aside misunderstandings which can only widen the gulf and make things infinitely worse. We are beginning to understand that the men at the helm in Petrograd are idealists, and what is more, have a profounder insight into European politics. We have all along maintained that our fight is with certain governments, not with the peoples groaning under a system as irksome to them as it is inimical to our own interests. At first we went into the business somewhat crudely. It seemed as if we were meddling with the internal affairs of other states, enemy states. And the chances were that our well-meant but untimely advice bore in it the potentialities of consolidating the system instead of breaking it down, of lining up behind the throne all the elements of the population. What we failed to accomplish, the Bolshevik prime minister and especially his minister for foreign affairs appear to have successfully consummated. There is now a rift between the German throne and the German people. And the credit for having caused it belongs to Trotzky. No one can foretell what momentous sequels the war will have led to. Probably some of the developments will not be to the liking of the instigators of the struggle, nor will they meet with the unqualified approval of those on the defensive. The truth is that forces have been unleashed over which no man has the control, elemental forces which must run their course. All that remains for man to do is to guide nature into a road least harmful, aye, most beneficial to our purposes. And the highest purpose will be accomplished not in the utter ruin of the fabric of civilization, but rather in the upbuilding of new and unwonted ideals. The supreme ideal indeed is democratization, not merely political, but also social. The wrongs which we are to right not only abroad but within our own borders are many. We cannot expect to emerge out of this conflict unchanged. We have left behind our traditional isolation for good. We are part of the world. Nothing that stirs in any corner is without its influence on us. Our democracy must become stronger and purer. Already we are learning that the law of supply and demand has for the time being made way for the law of unrestrained selfishness. Those are the very words used by our president. When a nation is stirred to co-ordinate action on so gigantic a scale, the selfseekers will have to be eliminated. War profiteering will be placed under the ban, it must be curbed. We pray and hope that the spirit of understanding which has so far distinguished the words and actions of our chief magistrate will continue to abide with him. Misunderstanding begets ill feeling. It estranges friends. What we need is the cementing force of fullest understanding begotten of openness of mind. The hour is portentous. Changes occur at a moment's notice. No old doctrines, no old philosophies will avail. Keep the mind fresh. Catch the meaning of the hour. Be charitable in your attitude to the changing atmosphere. Therein lies our salvation, in understanding, not in misunderstanding.

UNDERSTANDING THE JEWISH SITUATION.

We Jews, likewise, must learn that in our own affairs misunderstnding is baneful, while mutual understanding can only be beneficial. For a century Orthodoxy and Reform have been at daggers drawn. If in a recent utterance a well-known writer has leveled his shafts against Orthodoxy, the rejoinder is obvious: had it not been for Orthodoxy, stubborn, unyielding, in all these centuries, neither the writer nor we should be today on the scene. So much must be granted by all unprejudiced minds. Nor is it again fair to put down to the account of Reform all the ills of Jewry, all the havoc which the centrifugal forces once let loose have wrought in our fortunes, all the disintegration which has thinned our ranks. Standing above the parties, we are able to find good in the two camps. We grant the stability of the one. We concede the wisdom of making peace with the spirit of the age. It is the old fable of the oak that would not bend before the hurricane and the reed that succumbs to every wind. There is virtue in both positions. But the reed alone would be indeed a broken reed, just as the oak alone would not weather the storm. For a storm is on, has been on for a full century. Yet we live to tell the tale. And the merit must be dispassionately and equitably apportioned. The two-party system under which we have lived would seem to have made way for a multitude of parties. We are most likely in the midst of the world-wide upheaval. When things about us are undergoing momentary change and new alignments are everywhere discernible, we cannot expect to escape. Probably under different names the old division will continue. Here again true statesmanship counsels adjustment to changed conditions, taking as it were hourly stock. Old doctrines, old systems of thought must be refined in the crucible of time. None of us can be blind to the momentous significance of the opening up of Palestine to the Jew. While the theologians are re-furbishing antiquated weapons, the men of affairs who are gifted with singular foresight cast their prejudices to the winds and take their stand as true Jews should. When the Russian revolution in the twinkling of an eye liberated our brethren, a wise lay Jew saw disaster where others rejoiced. Not that he did not to the full welcome the change. But he foresaw that without a counter-force Judaism was doomed to slow but sure extinction. The forces of disintegration thrive in the atmosphere of freedom. It is true, we in the West have survived freedom, as we had withstood discrimination and persecution. Yet, we are only in the midst of the experiment. What the outcome will be, or rather would have been without the centripetal movement which has been with us for the last decades, the discerning minds full well understand. Right here in America the process of disintegration has set in. We have those who marry out or who step out. Just the other day we heard a well-known Unitarian minister casually speak of a parishioner who is a Russian Jew, a garment manufacturer. Probably he has found the atmosphere of the church to his liking. Let us not accuse such a one of social ambitions. He may have found his spiritual milieu. But none the less it is a sad aspect. Now that Palestine bids fair to become Jewish, we may all rest assured that whatever may happen in the dispersion there will be one spot where a remnant may truly survive. And there is this thought upon which few dwell. We doubt whether at all it has been seized upon. And it is this. While we lived under the belief that the dispersion was final, none of us, not even the most pronounced radical, was quite ready to go to the length of complete merging with our environment. We do not mean the absorption as it is usually conceived. For no true Jewish leader ever countenanced it. We mean simply the fullest measure of identification with the environment. It is quite true, our patriotism to the land of our birth or adoption was without flaw, despite all cavillers. But somehow in the depth of our soul we made a Jewish reservation. We had to, or else Jew and Judaism would have disappeared. We created a dual allegiance, although we gave to the one a religious significance. Now that the survival of the Jewish people is assured on Palestinian soil, we in the dispersion shall have no mental reservations whatsoever. The very fact that we choose to remain where we are, pronounces us as absolute parts of our environment. We are Americans to the full, spiritually, not merely politically. Judaism will cease to be a matter of race. The race element will play no role. Judaism for once will be a religion pure and simple, and Jews in the dispersion will be truly classed on a line with Catholics, Protestants, and other denominations. And in Palestine itself Judaism will come into its own. For with Judea as a state, there must necessarily be other races beside the Jews inhabiting it and sharing its political and cultural life. The distinguishing mark will be the religious. And Palestinian Judaism will be liberalized under the stress of life. Reform will have ceased to be a position adjusted to the dispersion. It will be world-wide, quite as potent in Jerusalem as it is in Cincinnati. Such is the significance of the changed Jewish situation. Let us try to understand, not to misunderstand.

UNITED STATES IS THE PALESTINE OF THE JEWISH RACE.

The Times received today from Simon Wolf, the following letter regarding his attitude on the formation of a Jewish state in Palestine:

"I exceedingly regret that your article in last evening's Times credits me with being a Zionist. I am today, as I have been in the past, and as I expect to be in the future, an American citizen of Jewish faith, who looks upon the United States as the Palestine of his people, or any other country where equal rights are accorded, not only to the Jew but to every human being. I sincerely hope that the German methods of propaganda are not being used to bolster any cause, no matter how meritorious.

"I distinctly stated to the party who called on me that if to be a good Jew, who had for seventy years worked for humanity, and notably for his own people, was to be a Zionist, then I was one, but not otherwise. I have always permitted each human being to have his own conviction, and claimed for myself the same privilege.

"I am opposed to a Jewish state in Palestine. The Jew, according to my conception, is the gulf stream, coursing through all the nations, and to establish a separate autonomy would, in my judgment, be a calamity. Agriculture and economic colonies, schools of learning, and all that appertains to happiness, are all no doubt desirable, but not a political state.

"I regret exceedingly to be compelled to make this statement, but my well-known position makes it imperative to do so".

(Washington, D. C. Times).

BRITISH RULE IN PALESTINE

The behavior of the British troops in Palestine has made a profound impression on the population, especially that part of it which is in a position to make a first-hand comparison with the sort of rule the Holy Land was subjected to before the capture of Jaffa and Jerusalem. The Jews are hastening back to Jaffa, from which they were expelled by Djemal Pasha, and resuming their normal life, confident that their days of anxiety are now at an end.

General Allenby's order of the day, according to information received by the Provisional Zionist Committee, exhorted the men in his command to remember the high reputation for justice, tolerance and fair-play which the British nation enjoys in the East, and expressed confidence that the Expeditionary Force would maintain the high standard of conduct it had hitherto shown. He called upon all commanding officers to guard and preserve all historic and sacred sites and buildings and the persons and property of all the inhabitants. These orders have been obeyed with the utmost scrupulousness.

UKRAINE MINISTERS FOR JEWISH HOMELAND.

The ministers in Ukraine declared themselves in favor of the Balfour declaration for the establishment of a Jewish homeland in Palestine and promised to urge this matter at the peace conference.

In a message sent to the Russian government by the English labor party, the declaration for the establishment of a Jewish land in Palestine is emphasized.

The Jewish youth in Galicia are organizing themselves in groups so they might be prepared to go to Palestine as soon as the conditions warrant. Only such as are able to converse in Hebrew are eligible to membership in these groups. About two thousand have already qualified and formed a central committee in Vienna.

A large number of Jewish students in Russia, especially in Kiev, have begun to study Hebrew. Special courses are given by good teachers and all Jewish students who wish to belong to the Jewish groups must become familiar with the Hebrew language.

DUTCH JEWS FORMULATE DEMANDS FOR PEACE CONFERENCE.

The Jews of Holland just concluded a series of conferences held by the various consistories and organizations for the purpose of defining the Jewish demands to be presented to the Peace Conference. All Jewish parties in Holland participated in these conferences and the final gathering formulated a series of demands which were made public at a great meeting at Amsterdam. They are as follows:

"The Congress of Jews resident in the Netherlands—and summoned by a committee formed by the Netherland section of the Alliance Israelite Universelle, the International Zionist Organization, and the Jewish Territorial Organization, for the purpose of formulating demands that have arisen for the present political situation for 'the emancipation of the Jews', 'the recognition of national rights in national states', 'the national concentration of the Jewish people in Palestine', and 'the constant contemptuous and oppressive treatment of the Jew and the century-long outrages that have been inflicted upon them shall cease at once and for all time'.

"It therefore, addresses to the government of the Netherlands its urgent entreaty that the latter, true to its century-old traditions, intervene in behalf of the Jews and use its best endeavors that at the Peace Conference—or at all events, upon the conclusion of peace—shall grant audience to the accredited representatives of organized Jewry, for a full settlement of the Jewish question to be put into effect under all necessary guarantees".

This conference also calls upon all the Jews of the Netherlands to demonstrate their solidarity at this turning point in history.

DISTRICT NO. 3 ORGANIZES FOR SOLDIER WELFARE WORK.

District No. 3 of the B'nai B'rith has undertaken the welfare work of the American Jewish soldiers and sailors in the camps embracing the states of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and West Virginia. Other districts of the B'nai B'rith are looking after the welfare work of the boys at the camps located in or adjacent to those districts. The purpose of the undertaking is to carry out the suggestions of the War Department Commission on Training Camp Activities, to help in making the breaking up of home ties of the soldiers less keen, and in the re-establishment of conditions approaching the normal of communal life.

The B'nai B'rith of District No. 3 proposes to extend the hand of hospitality to the boys outside of the camp and to offer them the cheer of fellowship—thus undertaking the task of attending to the social and material as well as the spiritual needs of the boys engaged in the war.

In addition to the work of the district, and to more effectively carry out this work, it is the purpose to organize in every community where there are Jews and where soldiers' and sailors' welfare work is necessary, a committee to be a branch of the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League. The purpose of such committee will be to provide recreation rooms, arrange entertainments, secure invitations for the boys to visit the homes of co-religionists, and to do such other work, or supply such needs to the boys as may be necessary to make the life of the soldier boy, when away from camp and his home, pleasant and beneficial.

Some communities by reason of the government distribution of the soldiers and sailors, have no need for this work, but can raise funds to be used in other sections. Other communities will find this work essential in their cities, but cannot raise sufficient funds to meet the needs. For this reason the district league offers to extend financial aid, and should be advised of the average number of such soldiers and sailors who visit the city, and whose homes are elsewhere; what work it is proposed to do, what financial aid, if any, is required for this purpose.

The work has the approbation of the authorities in Washington.

MAYOR HYLAN APPOINTS JEWS.

Among those who have been appointed to office by Mayor Hylan, of New York, are Morris Cukor, Municipal Civil Service Commissioner; Jacob A. Cantor, president of the Tax Board, and Maurice Simmons, member of the Board of Assessors.

True liberty can be safe only when suffrage is illuminated by education.—Garfield.

RABBINICAL COLLEGE BULLETIN

A new departure characterized the activities of the Rabbinical College of America this year. It was felt that the summer should not be spent altogether unprofitably. A course was arranged and most of the senior students spent the month of July in Belmar, N. J., where they continued their studies under the supervision of Rabbi Dr. B. Revel the president of the faculty, who has his summer home there. It was interesting to note the fervor with which the students applied themselves to the studying of the Talmud and Codes. When the days were too hot, groups of young men would spend from midnight to four o'clock in the morning discussing intricate problems of Jewish law. During the Sabbath service in the Belmar synagogue, sermons were delivered by a number of students. The summer school in this nature proved highly successful and plans are already under way for the extension next year.

The new term will open immediately after the High Holy Days. Several scholarships to the value of three hundred dollars per annum each are now available. For full information apply to the president of the faculty, 9-11 Montgomery St.

A number of additional prizes for essays are now offered. The Scheff Prize of $50.00 for an essay on a Halachic subject, the Travis Prize of $50.00 for an essay on a Scientific subject, the Travis Prize of $25.00 for the best oration, the S. Rottenberg Prize of $50.00 for the Rabbinical College Zionist Society for an essay (subject to be announced).

Rabbi Aaron David Burak, a graduate of the Rabbinical College, has received a call from Congregation Ohel Moshe Chevrah Tehillim, one of the most important orthodox congregations in Brooklyn, N. Y. Rabbi Burak is only 25 years old and has a high reputation for scholarship. He was the unanimous choice of the congregation.

The Agudath Harabonim (Union of Orthodox Rabbis of America and Canada), has issued a call to all minor Yeshibaths and to all Talmud Torahs in the United States to encourage pupils who are studying Talmud and who are public school graduates, to prepare for admission to the Preparatory Department of the Rabbinical College. Where no such Talmud classes exists, the Agudoh is ready to promote and assist the establishing of such classes.

Applications from intending students have been received from many parts of the country.

The library of the college has been increased by a generous gift from the collection of the late Mr. Israel Lipschitz. and includes several hundred volumes of Judaica. The gift was made possible through the kindness of Mr. Lipschitz.

A PROGRESSIVE RACE

The Intelligencer welcomes to the city the distinguished Jewish delegations from other States, who are attending a meeting of the Grand Lodge of the great Jewish benevolent organization, a body that is engaged in such commendable service, a service that is characteristic of the race. Among this gathering it is a pleasure to note the number of men of distinction, men who are holding high public offices in the States they hail from. There is no class of citizens who are establishing themselves so firmly in the institutional progress of the country by their innate abilities as the Jews. They are to be found first among the financial, commercial and business activities, and are recognized as forces at the bar, on the bench and in high preferment in governmental affairs. In other words, they are the best citizens we can boast of today.

Why shouldn't they be when members of the race have so long enjoyed distinctive honors in the European countries as constructive statesmen and men of vision and large performance and in the social betterment of the world. And it is noteworthy in this connection that Lord Reading, who occupies one of the highest offices in the British civil government, and who comes to us as the successor of Ambassador Sir Cecil Spring-Rice, was born plain Isaacs, and that he arose to his high state from the humble beginning of a cabin boy. An equally felicitious incident was the message of good wishes sent to the B'nai B'rith convention yesterday by Governor Moses Alexander, of Idaho, the first Jew to be elected to that office in the United States.—Wheeling Intelligencer.

BIBLE READING IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

As a result of the protest made to the Board of Education of the city of Waco, Texas Bible reading in public schools has been discontinued.

AT B'NAI B'RITH HEADQUARTERS

Every loyal member of the B'nai B'rith when passing through the Windy City should pay his respects to the venerable head of the order, Judge Adolf Kraus. I did and I am glad of it. Number 1228 Tribune building is to the Jews of this country what No. 26 Broadway is to the Standard Oil interests. A visit to Chicago without calling here is like visiting Portland and not seeing Mt. Hood.

The general offices of the B'nai B'rith present an animated scene. Not much money was wasted for furniture, but the essentials are here—desks, typewriters, shelves and chairs. It takes the combined efforts of four stenographers to keep up with the strenuous Mr. Kraus and the dynamic secretary, A. B. Seelenfreund. The latter I found in his shirt-sleeves, working as if his very life depended on it.

However, there was Mr. Kraus—here, there and everywhere—giving suggestions, dictating letters and receiving visitors. His own offices around the corner very rarely see him for any length of time. It is in the B'nai B'rith rooms that he is to be found. It is here that his heart interest lies. A talk with him will convince even the most skeptical that the B'nai B'rith is a living factor. When he speaks of the work of the order you forget it is an old man who is before you, for the enthusiasm is that of youth.

At any rate, Mr. Kraus will endeavor to regain some of the youth he gave the order by making a trip to the Pacific Coast. His point of destination is Los Angeles. In Southern California's sunny clime he will bask for a few weeks, then he will visit San Francisco and Portland. The former city has had the privilege of a visit from him before—two and one-half years ago—when the Constitution Grand Lodge met, but Portland still has the treat before it. The grand old man of Jewry is certainly an honor to entertain.

And Seelenfreund—or as he is intimately called here, A. B.—he is the active force which is a part of all B'nai B'rith movements. When he became secretary of District No. 6, in 1903, Chicago had 346 members; it now has 3,600 members.

Covenant Club, in the heart of Chicago's business section, is its location, and with a membership of 500 it continues to keep pace with the city. Only B'nai B'rith members are eligible, and they certainly make use of it. It has all the advantages of a first-class club, but not like other Jewish clubs—no ham is served.

Tonight I am to attend a meeting of Ramah Lodge. A class of 100 is to be initiated. This is the third class within a few weeks. The former classes were composed of 320 and 200, respectively.—M. Mosessohn in Portland Jewish Tribune.

SOCIAL SERVICE WORK IN DISTRICT NO. 2.

Welfare work in penal institutions was discussed at a meeting of the social service committee of District Grand Lodge No. 2.

The necessity of furnishing the Jewish Bible to prisoners in penal institutions throughout the district was urged. It was pointed out that out of the sixty-nine Jewish prisoners paroled from the Ohio state penitentiary during the past five years only two have been returned to the institution for violation of parole. It was resolved that the chairman and the president of the Grand Lodge be empowered to expend a sum not to exceed $300 for the purchase of Bibles for distribution among Jewish prisoners in penal institutions in the district, provided that an appropriation for this purpose be first secured from the Grand Lodge upon the recommendation of the general committee.

The committee decided to have a new survey made of Jewish penal, charitable and eleemosynary institutions throughout the district. It was agreed at the meeting that if this survey should disclose the urgent need of new Jewish institutions in a particular community, efforts should be made by the B'nai B'rith in co-operation with the local community to fufill the need. It was also decided that every national Jewish institution be requested to notify the social service committee, local or district, of the date and circumstances of the discharge of each patient or inmate, so that the community to which the patient or inmate is being returned may make adequate provision for proper living conditions and suitable environment.

Morality can no more subsist without religion than a tree can flourish when separated from its roots.—Rt. Rev. D. J. Dougherty.

The Board of Governors feel that the selection of Rabbi and Mrs. Pollak as superintendent and matron will mean much not only to the institution, but to the inmates thereof.

Sixteenth Convention of District Grand Lodge No. 3

Following a preliminary meeting of the general committee held at the Hotel Windsor, Wheeling, W. Va., Saturday evening, Jan. 26, 1918, the formal opening of the convention of District Grand Lodge No. 3 convened in formal session in the Scottish Rite Cathedral Sunday morning, Jan. 27, 1918.

Grand Treasurer M. S. Meyerhoff submitted report showing payment to all beneficiaries of the Endowment Fund.

The address of welcome was delivered by Eugene M. Baer, president of Wheeling Lodge, preceded by prayer by Rabbi Louis D. Gross of the Eoff Street Temple.

The address of welcome to the city was delivered by the Hon. Morgan Vester, mayor, and responded to by the Hon. Joseph L. Kun, of Philadelphia, deputy attorney general of Pennsylvania.

The Grand Lodge session reconvened at 2:30 o'clock and continued until 5:30, after which an automobile ride was given the visiting ladies, ending at the Hotel Windsor after an enjoyable afternoon.

Past President Judge S. J. Straus, of Wilkesbarre, conferred the degree of past president on delegates entitled to same.

Morris J. Schaffber, president of the board of directors of the Erie Orphanage, reported a reduction in the building fund indebtedness from $46,000 to $20,741.

Isadore Sobel, president board of governors, referred in glowing terms to the fulfillment of pledge made by Rabbi A. H. Silver at the convention in 1916 of $6.000 toward the building fund.

The matter of the American Soldiers and Sailors' Welfare League is taking up a great deal of the time of the convention, the delegates endeavoring to render a great service for the Jewish boys in the various cantonments and as well those now in France.

The program of the evening was of a musical nature. The patriotic medley, organ and piano duet, by Prof. and Mrs. J. Jelly was unusually beautiful and was received with much enthusiasm. Davis Daniels gave a violin solo with Miss Lena Kraft at the piano, which was a revelation of sweet music. Mrs. Elsa Gundling Duga sang a solo, assisted by Miss Jessie A. Wolf at the piano, which was well received, and her vocal interpretations were delightful.

Rabbi Solomon Faster, of Newark, N. J., delivered an address, touching upon the work of the B'nai B'rith and its work, followed by a peculiar combination of musical instruments—flute, Robert Luke; violin, Walter Rodgers, and harp, Frank Seal. These three instruments were handled to perfection by the musicians.

Rabbi Isidor Rosenthal, of Lancaster, Pa., delivered an address, followed by a vocal solo by Mrs. Elsa Gundling Duga.

The morning and afternoon session on Monday proved to be a busy day for a large number of delegates present.

Election of officers for the ensuing term resulted as follows:

Marcus Fenchwanger, New Castle, president.

David Bortin, Philadelphia, first vice-president.

Norris Schaffner, Erie, Pa., second vice-president.

M. S. Meyerhoff, Philadelphia, treasurer.

Edwin Hemple, Pittsburgh, secretary.

General Committee.

Harry Platofsky, Philadelphia.
David Phillips, Philadelphia.
Louis Rosenblatt, Wellington, Del.
Albert Rosenstein, Lancaster, Pa.
Adolph Edlis, Pittsburgh, Pa.
Leon B. Stein, Wheeling.
Joseph Reuben, McKeesport, Pa.
Benjamin Sugarman, Newark, N. J.

The newly elected officers were installed by Brother Hon. Jacob Singer, of Philadelphia, a member of the executive committee of the Order for District No. 3.

The next bi-annual convention of the district will be held in Atlantic City in the year 1920.

The feature of the afternoon session was an address by Dr. M. M. Feuerlict, of Indianapolis, embodying an impressive appeal for the Jewish War Relief Fund. His address was filled with many patriotic sketches of soldier life, telling of their loyalty to America and its allies.

The response was seldom equaled in the history of the Grand Lodge. Much enthusiasm was shown and the amount of $1,000 was donated by the lodge and an additional amount of $4,000 was quickly subscribed from the floor.

The entire convention went on record with the newly elected officers of standing by the United States government to the end in the present encounter with a foreign foe. There was much patriotism shown throughout the convention. The hall was decorated with large American flags and from every post several flags were draped in clusters. Every speech, toast or address delivered during the convention was noted for the patriotism it carried with it, and the object of the convention seemed a secondary one throughout the gathering.

The convention was brought to a close with a banquet in the large dining room of the temple, followed by a magnificent ball. The affair was attended by about six hundred persons, among whom were some of the most prominent Jewish representatives in the country.

At the banquet Gumps' orchestra furnished the music and during the dinner "Joan of Arc", "Over There", "Star Spangled Banner" and other patriotic songs were sung in chorus by all present. Words were written to fit the music to conform with the rights, principles and good will of the B'nai B'rith.

The big dance hall was filled with long tables and plenty of dainty dishes were furnished to the several hundred guests, who were seated quietly and with the discipline unusual to a gathering of that size. The hall was decorated with the American flags throughout and Toastmaster Leon B. Stein and guests at the speakers' table embodied in their several toasts and addresses more patriotism than has been shown in a meeting in that city for many months. In fact, the banquet and dance bordered more on the loyalty to the red, white and blue than it did to the actual event itself.

During the banquet the following program of speaking was carried out:

Prayer—Rabbi Louis D. Gross.

Reminiscences—Frederick Jay, past president District No. 3.

The Future of District No. 3—Marcus Feuchtuanger, president District No. 3.

The Ladies—Hon. Jos. W. Salus, past president District No. 3.

Facts—Rabbi A. H. Silver.

Our Institutions—Hon. Judge S. J. Strauss, past president District No. 3.

Harmony—Hon. Jacob Singer, executive committee.

Addresses by newly elected officers.

The singing of the "Star Spangled Banner" brought the festivity to a close.

The committee on resolutions presented the following report, which was adopted by a rising vote:

"Resolved, That the delegates to this convention express to Wheeling Lodge No. 615 and the Jewish citizens of Wheeling, W. Va., their deep sense of appreciation and thanks for their untiring and splendid efforts in making and carrying out to such a happy conclusion the arrangements and details of this convention and for the genuine and spontaneous hospitality and interests shown to our delegates and visitors. This harmonious convention is largely due to their efforts, and be it further resolved, that the thanks of this convention be tendered to the city of Wheeling for its hearty and cheerful welcome as expressed by its mayor, Hon. C. Morgan Vester.

"Resolved, That the thanks of this convention be tendered to Rabbi Louis D. Gross, of Wheeling, W. Va.; to Leon B. Stein, chairman of the local committee of arrangements, and all other members of this committee, and to the press of the city of Wheeling, for their uniform courtesy and care in reporting in their columns the important events of this convention.

"We also express our thanks for the gracious and appreciative interest and assistance of the ladies of Wheeling whose work aided materially in the entertainment of the guests, as well as to the management of the Scottish Rite Cathedral, who have rendered many courtesies and much helpful assistance.

"Be it further resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon the minutes and published in the B'nai B'rith News and the Wheeling newspapers".

The arrangement committee had invited the Governor of West Virginia to attend the convention and address the same. Unfortunately the Governor was prevented from accepting the invitation and communicated with the committee as per the following letter:

State of West Virginia,
Executive Department,
Charleston.
Jan. 24, 1918.

Mr. Leon B. Stein, Chairman,
Wheeling, W. Va.

My Dear Mr. Stein:

I do not think you will be able to understand how much regret I experienced at having to wire you cancelling my engagement to attend the meeting of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith on the 27th instant and to forego extending, as the Chief Executive of the state, a welcome to your visiting delegates from other states, but I am sure you do fully realize the vast number of unusual and perplexing questions with which I am compelled to deal daily. Inasmuch as my presence at the War Department in Washington is demanded on Saturday, the 26th, and that I may be detained in that city over Sunday, you will, of course, see the impossibility of my having the pleasure of being with you.

However, I want you to express not only my regret at my inability to be present in person, but also extend for me a cordial welcome to your visiting delegates. The high character and noble purposes of your Order may be taken as an indication of the type of men who will compose the representation, whether coming from this or other states.

The Jewish people, the acknowledged leaders in world finance, are equally famed for their broad, human sympathy and charity. Victims of persecution, as they have been, in many, if not in most, of the country of the old world, it is quite natural their sympathy should go out to the persecuted and that they should be, as they have proven themselves, generous wherever charity is deserved. The aims and purposes of your organization are merely a practical manifestation of the Jewish spirit as we see and recognize it in this country.

Following this terrible war the spirit of philanthropy and charity will be needed more than ever before, for coming out of the conflict will be, I greatly fear, many of our fellow-citizens who will be maimed or whose health will be so wrecked and their strength so depleted that they will need to be cared for by the nation, the state or by the charitably inclined. For that reason it is highly desirable that the spirit of your Order be implanted in the minds and hearts of all our people more firmly than ever before.

May I express the hope that your meeting will be as pleasant as I know it will be profitable? Not profitable in a commercial sense, but in that higher and finer sense whereby the intellect is brightened, the mantle of charity broadened and the spirit of humanity and of fellowship strengthened by such associations as you will have the privilege of enjoying and which I sincerely regret not being able to enjoy with you.

Very sincerely yours,
(Signed) JNO. J. CORNWELL.

A TRIBUTE.

membrance of his benefactions often goes with it. Had people's memories been better, Belisarius would not have been obliged to beg his bread in blind, old age, and Columbus would have been spared repenting in chains his discovery of a new world. When Disraeli returned from the memorable Berlin Congress to receive honors greater than any that England had ever bestowed on a statesman, the London Times remarked that it was the fittest for him to die. Could he have followed that advice he would have spared himself later humiliating defeat. Not the least of God's favor is death at the right time and place. That divine favor was vouchsafed to Edward L. Heinsheimer. Well might the prayer of each of us be, in the words of Scriptures, "May my end be like his".

Because Much Done, More To Be Done.

Great as has been the work which Heinsheimer did, yet greater work remains to be done by us. It is for the very reason that he did so much that so much is yet to be done. As it is only when a great invention has been made, that we learn how much is yet to be invented, as it is only when a great book has been written that we learn how much has not yet been written, as it is only when a great sermon has been preached that we learn how much truth is still unspoken, so it is only when a great work has been done that we learn how much is left undone.

His Legacy To Us.

Ours is the duty to transmute our loss into gain, to convert our sorrow into resolve to labor as he labored until the great Masterbuilder took the tools from his hand, even while at work, and laid him to rest. While he sleeps, let us work. Far more precious than tears, far more eloquent than eulogy, far more commemorative than monument, will be completion by the present and coming generations of the great work begun by Isaac M. Wise, continued by Bernhard Bettmann, carried still further forward by Edward L. Heinsheimer. They have won their crown; so may we labor that when our resting time will come we shall be found deserving ours.

NEWS FROM LONDON.

Doubtless—unfortunately—there will be more. We may assure our Jewish brethren in the States that their patients will be treated with as much care and kindliness as our own men. Jewish visitors are attached to all the military hospitals, so that Jewish soldiers of the American army who have the misfortune to be sick will not be too lonely during their medical treatment.

The Anglo-Jewish community has just lost two very noteworthy women—Mrs. Nathaniel Cohen and Mrs. Lionel Lucas. Both belonged to respected families who have been settled in England for generations, and this sense of tradition is accountable for a good deal of their distinction. Mrs. Cohen was a daughter of the late Professor Waley, and the wife of the late Mr. Nathaniel Louis Cohen, who was for many years a public worker in London. Gifted with a fine brain and an even finer heart, Mrs. Cohen fittingly acted as the president of the Union of Jewish Women. Like all people who are truly great, Mrs. Cohen possessed sympathy and understanding, and she was blessed with a good dose of wisdom. Needless to add, she was intensely Jewish in her feelings and outlook, and being one of the People of the Book, she was always foremost in encouraging and acquiring Jewish learning. Of Mrs. Lionel Lucas, it suffices to say that she was famous for her old-fashioned charity. The daughter of Frederick Goldsmid, among the first Jewish members of Parliament, and sister of Sir Julian Goldsmid, she, too, had a fine tradition to be proud of, and she maintained the high standard to her very last day. She was never appealed to in vain, whether the cause was the relief of distress, the assistance of education or the advancement of religion, Mrs. Lucas gave liberally. "Who shall say how many synagogues she helped to raise, how many broken lives she helped to rebuild, how many sorrowing hearts she helped to comfort"? so the Rev. Morris Joseph, who knew her well, spoke of her.

During the war the activities of the lodge have naturally been somewhat curtailed. Nevertheless, the year that has just ended has a respectable record to its credit, thanks to the president, Brother S. Gilbert. In a period when many members are in the army and those who are left behind are loaded with a more than ordinary share of work, the lodge may be satisfied with its achievements. For the time after the war, many problems are already visible, and the lodge may be able to do a good deal, either actively or by guidance and direction. One such question is the assistance that might be rendered to disabled Jewish soldiers and sailors in order to make them self-supporting. The immediate interest at the lodge is the choice of new office-bearers for the current year. As usual, this will be determined at the January meeting, and in the next letter we hope to be able to report on the doings on that occasion.

MANUAL FOR TEACHING BIBLICAL HISTORY.

By Rabbi Eugene Kohn.

This book presents the traditional interpretation of the salient portions of the five books of Moses. Difficult points are cleared up and explained lucidly in a way which makes for reverence for our Holy Book. The aim suggested to the teacher is the inculcation of deep spiritual truths that are in accordance with the rabbinical interpretation of the text. The hints to the teacher evidence a thorough knowledge of the principles of psychology. They abound with invaluable suggestions, and the model lessons with which the author illustrates his points are in themselves an important contribution to Jewish pedagogy.

The style is simple, concise and interesting. The manual will prove valuable not only to the teacher but is also intended to serve as a text book for adult Bible classes.

It is 8 mo., 220 pages, cloth binding gold printed title, a handsome volume whose price is fixed at the low rate of $1.00. For schools the price is 75c, if ordered in lots of more than ten copies. Orders should be sent to The United Synagogue of America, 531 W. 123rd St. New York City.

Judge Baer of the Municipal Court of Cleveland fined Asa Anderson, proprietor of a dancing academy, $100 and costs for denying admission to a young man because he was of the Jewish race. Counsel for the defendant declared that the proprietor was not operating a public amusement, but the Judge ruled that on this particular occasion the hall was being operated as a public dance hall. The young man was asked whether he was Jewish. When he admitted that he was, he was told to come back some other day.

THE AMERICAN SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' WELFARE LEAGUE OF THE INDEPENDENT ORDER OF B'NAI B'RITH

The campaign for funds in District No. 6 shows a result of over $25,000 in cash, besides several thousand dollars outstanding in pledges. The greater part of this sum was raised during the time when the city suffered from one of the most severe blizzards in its history. The team captains and their men are to be commended for their faithfulness in giving their time and labor to this cause.

District No. 2 has raised nearly $20,000 in cash and pledges, with which it proposes to undertake soldier welfare work in each of the cantonments within its district. Active work has already been undertaken at Chillicothe, Ohio, which work is in charge of Dr. Joseph Leiser, formerly of Joplin, Mo.

District No. 7 has raised over $7,000 for the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League. Many of the cantonments in District No. 7 are under quarantine, so that it is impossible to report upon the work being done in this district.

District No. 4 has established headquarters for the men stationed at Camp Lewis, a more complete report of which work is given elsewhere.

Many cases of personal service have been rendered by the members of the Order throughout the entire country. The Chicago office has become a clearing house for information and advice regarding soldiers and their dependent families. The Social Service Committees and the local branches of the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League have co-operated nobly in assisting in this great work.

Camp Logan, Houston, Texas.

Arrangements have now been made whereby Jewish men may attend religious services right in the camp. Each Sunday morning one of the Rabbis of Houston officiates. Mr. Freefield, in charge of the recreational work at Houston, advises us that the attendance at the Jewish religious services is in many cases greater than at any of the other religious services.

The entire Houston community has now organized for soldier welfare work. The work has grown so rapidly that the old quarters were found inadequate. Arrangements are being made to rent additional space to accommodate the large numbers of soldiers who attend our headquarters. During the week beginning Jan. 12, over 625 boys visited the headquarters. During the preceding week over 600 boys were in attendance.

A series of entertainments is being given in which all the Jewish organizations participate. The following affairs have been given during the month of January: New Year's Eve dance by the Jewish Literary Society, New Year's Eve dance by the Concordia Club, dance and bazaar under the auspices of the B'nai B'rith, dance and entertainment under the auspices of the B'nai B'rith, smoker under the auspices of the B'nai B'rith, program by Jewish Literary Society, program by Yiddish Library Association, dance and musicale under auspices of B'nai B'rith, dance and entertainment by Jewish Literary Society. These are in addition to the Wednesday night dances given regularly at the headquarters and the Tuesday night dancing classes also held at the headquarters. All of these entertainments are free and are open to both Jews and non-Jews.

Each Sunday the Jewish residents of Houston invite the boys at camp for Sunday dinner. Over 120 boys took advantage of these invitations during the month of January.

Camp Lewis, Tacoma, Wash.

Through the auspices of the District Grand Lodge No. 4, a fourteen-room residence has been leased at Tacoma, Wash., and has been remodeled as a recreational headquarters for the men stationed at Camp Lewis. Dormitories are provided to furnish accommodations for two hundred men. An average of nearly one hundred soldiers have taken advantage of these over-night accommodations. The headquarters are equipped with reception rooms, writing rooms, music room, pool room, shower room and steam room. The Jewish community of Tacoma is thoroughly organized for this work and are certainly doing their "bit" to make the life of the soldiers more pleasant. The cost of furnishing and remodeling these headquarters are approximately $10,000.

Camp Custer, Battle Creek, Mich.

A series of entertainments is being provided each Wednesday noon and evening in the B'nai B'rith Club Rooms by the Jewish Women's Society of Battle Creek. These programs include music and dancing. Several entertainments have been provided by Mishan Lodge of Kalamazoo. On Jan. 1, an entertainment and supper was given by the Jewish Women's Society of Battle Creek, at which one hundred people were present. Religious services are held regularly each Friday night at the B'nai B'rith Club Rooms.

Camp Dodge, Des Moines, Iowa.

Here also, as at Houston, the work has extended so that it has become necessary to provide additional space at the recreation headquarters. Practically the entire floor of the building is now being used for the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League. Religious services are now being held regularly at the Y. M. C. A. Building. On Friday evening, Jan. 11, special Sabbath services were held at the Y. M. C. A. Building, Des Moines. These were in charge of Private Abraham Geckler, a former Chazan and Rabbi. On Jan. 15 a supper and dance was given at Temple B'nai Jeshurun. On Sunday, Jan. 19, a smoker was given at the B'nai B'rith Headquarters. On Wednesday, Jan. 23, a dance was given at the headquarters under the auspices of Rabbi Cohen's congregation.

A number of the Jewish men are ill at the hospital. At the last visit made to the hospital by Mr. Wolff, over forty men, nearly all of them from the Ordnance Department, were recovering from operations. Eight men during the past month were assisted with loans. Since the opening of the headquarters quite a number of boys have been helped in this way. It is interesting to note that every dollar of this money has been returned by the borrowers. The list of Jewish men stationed at Camp Dodge now totals 248, of whom 27 are commissioned officers. Too much praise cannot be given the Jewish community of Des Moines for their many endeavors in making the B'nai B'rith headquarters a success.

Camp Beauregard, Alexandria, La.

Camp Beauregard is still under quarantine. A number of new cases of meningitis has developed and every precaution is being taken to protect the men. Practically all the time of the Director in Alexandria is taken up in visiting those who are sick at the hospital.

Camp Shelby, Hattiesburg, Miss.

Perhaps the most popular feature of the B'nai B'rith Community Hall at Hattiesburg is the dormitory accommodations. Over four hundred men per month make use of these accommodations. During the month of December, 792 letters were written at the headquarters, 87 prayer books were distributed and 26 acts of personal service rendered to the men and their relatives. Three entertainments were given during the month, the attendance totaling 850 men. One hundred and thirty-seven men were entertained by Jewish families during the month.

Camp Meade, Baltimore, Md.

Religious services are being held each Sunday at Camp Meade under the auspices of Menorah Lodge at Baltimore. During the month of January over 200 men slept at the dormitories of the B'nai B'rith Headquarters. Nearly 100 men visit the headquarters each week end. Owing to sickness in camp, leaves of absence have been infrequent, so that the men cannot take advantage of the opportunity afforded at the recreational headquarters.

Chicago.

During the coming month Chicago will give three different performances for the benefit of the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League. On Feb. 24, Ramah Lodge, No. 33, is conducting a minstrel show. This promises to be one of the most attractive and best attended of the Jewish entertainments and dances given this winter. The Young People's Jewish Congress is planning for a dance, to be given at the Auditorium Hotel, the proceeds of which will be devoted to the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League. The Yiddish drama which was to be produced on Feb. 11, has been postponed until Wednesday, March 13. Joseph Kessler, a well-known Yiddish actor, has offered the services of himself and his entire company as his contribution toward the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League. The play to be produced, "In a Strange World," is a drama full of literary gems and dramatic incidents of the highest quality.

While the "drive" for $25,000 for soldier welfare work has been completed, many contributions are being received daily, showing that many of the teams are still at work.

The Red Cross Auxiliary, under the direction of Mrs. A. D. Weiner, is still continuing its good work. Up to the present time nearly 300 different articles have been distributed to the boys at the various cantonments.

Early in March the Chicago Chapter of the Council of Jewish Women plans to give an entertainment for the soldiers at the B'nai B'rith Headquarters at Rockford. Several hundred visitors from Chicago are expected to be present.

Camp Grant, Rockford, Ill.

On Sunday, Jan. 20, 1918, our headquarters was the scene of a musical entertainment and dance which was participated in by over 300 soldiers and 100 civilians. Music was furnished by the members of the 344th Field Hospital Band and by Corporal Charles Lowry of Company K, 343rd Infantry, who volunteered in the absence of the regular band drummer and proved himself a most efficient and able substitute. Supper was served for all at 5:30 p.m., through the courtesy of our own organization, the ladies of our local refreshment committee rendering us, as in the past, efficient aid. We were pleased to have with us on that day a considerable number of visitors from Chicago, who by the spirit in which they entered into the occasion, helped towards its success.

On Tuesday, Jan. 29, through the courtesy of several theatrical men of our faith, who, because of the coal shortage edict were at leisure that evening, a jazz concert and entertainment was given for the soldiers.

Over 125 were present, all of whom joined enthusiastically in thanking the performers for a very enjoyable evening. We are hoping to be able to continue this feature as long as the theatres continue closed Tuesdays.

On Saturday evening, Feb. 9, again through the courtesy of a few of our co-religionists who were participating in the regular show at one of the local theatrical houses, we were enabled to offer an informal vaudeville entertainment of a few numbers to the boys who were present in the hall.

On Sunday evening, Feb. 10, a regular vaudeville show and dance were held at the headquarters. Privates Jordan and Estes and Grenberg of the 344th Field Hospital, contributed several song and dance numbers. All of the former are professional actors who have in the past been paid highly for their services and for our good fortune in securing them without charge, we are indeed deeply grateful. Supper was served as usual, without any charge to all who were present, and dancing continued until 9:00 p.m.

Our hall, as in the past, continues to be a meeting place for all the soldiers who come to town. Kaddish services for mourners have been arranged at various times. All of the soldiers here have come to feel that we are at their service in any way that we can be of help to them, and day by day the field of usefulness along all lines of service is broadening. On several stormy nights when the soldiers, because of weather conditions, were unable to return to the camp, our headquarters accommodated over night from ten to thirty men who were unable to obtain accommodations at any of the local hotels. We are continuing, as in the past, at all times to render the same open hospitality and are continuing to serve coffee, cake, etc., during evenings and on Saturdays and Sundays to the boys who frequent our headquarters.

For Feb. 24, the Council of Jewish Women of Chicago are arranging a purim entertainment and dance which promises to be one of the largest affairs held by us. We are hoping that for this occasion as many of the young ladies of Chicago as possibly can will come to Rockford and visit their soldier friends and thus make it possible to conduct a successful affair.

Our religious services at the camp continue to be conducted as heretofore. On Jan. 27, Feb. 3 and Feb. 10, the services were conducted by Rabbis Cohan, Hirschberg and Hevesh, respectively. Our attendance has been satisfactory to date and it is hoped to materially increase it with the lifting of the quarantine from a goodly number of the companies at the camp and with more favorable weather conditions.

We are very glad to report at the present writing there are only four or five of our co-religionists who are ill at the base hospital. Those who have been ill have been visited regularly—four to five visits a week are paid to the hospital by our director, and whatever can be done for the comfort of the boys is attended to. Our office has on very many occasions in the past month been the medium of communication between anxious parents and quarantined sons, serving to allay a considerable [illegible] of worry. In two cases, loans in small amounts of money were met to enable boys who were telegraphed for because of sickness in their family to reach their homes, and as in the past, we have continued the policy of distributing the knitted wear sent to us by the ladies of Chicago and other nearby cities. With the coming in of a new contingent of men during the present month, the need for this last mentioned service will, of course, be considerably greater.

The following letter was received at our headquarters. It is signed by 37 non Jewish men. "We, the undersigned members of the 343rd Regiment, who are of the Christian faith, wish to express our appreciation to the B'nai B'rith organization for the favors and comforts bestowed upon us by the organization through their representative, Mr. Horvitz, the director in charge.

"We are always welcome at the hall and spend an enjoyable time while there.

"We wish to offer our sincerest wishes to the B'nai B'rith and wish them continued success in their work.

The following letter was received from one of the soldiers at Houston:

Camp Logan, Jan. 15, 1918.

B'nai B'rith.

Dear Sirs: I wish to voice my praise and appreciation of the work your association has done for me and the other Jewish soldiers at Camp Logan. They have done a great deal for me, both at camp and while at the base hospital here, and I hear great praise from all sides, of the work they are doing.

The social entertainments they give are a pleasure to attend. Too much credit cannot be given to Mr. Freefield of your association. I have been at Camp Logan from the first day it was open, and when there was only 100 Jewish boys, and your organization was small, and I have seen it grow and hope to see it grow larger. I had to write you of my appreciation of your work here.

Sincerely yours,
(Signed) Private Wm. Prichason,
Co. I., 132nd U. S. Infantry.

An indication of the splendid spirit of co-operation existing between the Jewish and non-Jewish residents of Rockford:

A. E. Schulein, President of Jewish Club of American Soldiers, City.

My Dear Mr. Schulein:

The notice in the daily papers of the good work this club it doing, prompts me to do a bit. It will afford me pleasure if you will present to this club 50 "Moffatt's Imperials" for the benefit of the soldiers.

Wishing the officers and the club members success and happiness in their daily life as well as the club work, I beg to remain

Yours very truly,
FRED H. MOFFATT.

The following letter is one of many received by the B'nai B'rith Auxiliary:

Camp Logan, Jan. 6, 1918.

My Dear Mrs. Weiner:

I received a dandy pair of woolen socks from the B'nai B'rith and knowing you are taking charge of this work, I want to take this opportunity to thank you. They sure are dandy for even though we are down South; we have days which are very cold. I'm sure all the soldiers receiving any of your much needed wool presents are surely made happy. I trust you will continue this good work and I'm sure the boys will sure show their appreciation. Wishing you heaps of success in your work, I am

Respectfully yours,
(Signed) PRIVATE ISIDOR BRO.
131st Infantry, Co. F.

RACINE, WIS.

Racine Lodge No. 697 of Racine, Wis., held its installation of officers on Jan. 30, 1918. In spite of the fact that it was very cold, a good-sized attendance was present from the members of Racine and Kenosha.

Brother Charles L. Aarons, of Milwaukee, past president of the District Grand Lodge, was the guest of honor and installed the officers for the ensuing term and then addressed the lodge. The meeting was open to the public and a great many non-members and their ladies were present. A social entertainment followed, including dancing.

Brother Aarons in his report states that the lodge is destined to grow considerably during the coming year, as the spirit of the lodge appears to be excellent.

B'NAI B'RITH OF LOS ANGELES.

In the presence of a membership which filled every available space in the lodge rooms the officers of Los Angeles Lodge were installed by Past President Harry A. Hollzer, acting as district deputy for the Grand Lodge at the meeting held on Jan. 7, 1918. At the conclusion of the ceremonies a class of ten candidates was initiated.

Upon taking office, President H. W. Frank addressed the lodge, sounding the keynote of the aims and policies for the coming year.

After the regular program was carried out, the lodge was brought to a close with the singing of the national anthem and the members were invited to adjourn to the adjoining room and partake of refreshments, during which short speeches were made by Rabbis Myers, Liknitz and Magnin.

The feature of the evening was the presentation of a service flag in honor of the eleven members of the lodge who have joined the United States service. Mr. Bearman in presenting the flag made a patriotic and most interesting address.

A very large and interesting meeting of the Ladies' Auxiliary of the B'nai B'rith Lodge was held Monday evening, Jan. 14, at B'nai B'rith Hall. Election of officers took place.

During the course of the evening, Mrs. Ellis Brockow spoke of the fine work the Auxiliary has been doing and of its latest achievement, the donating of soldiers' kits to the boys at Camp Kearny. Another speaker was Mr. H. W. Frank, president of Los Angeles Lodge, who delivered an eloquent address on the good and welfare of the organization.

Mr. M. Salzman, past president of the B'nai B'rith, also addressed the Auxiliary. An enjoyable evening was spent by all those present.

Initial steps were taken by the Los Angeles Lodge, No. 487, at the first meeting held under the new administration on Jan. 22, 1918, to perfect an organization in the city, whereby harmony in charitable work among the numerous Jewish charitable organizations in the community will be made possible.

In an address upon the subject President Frank emphasized the fact that much of the charitable efforts on the part of well-meaning people were made practically nil because of the fact that there was no concerted Jewish effort and elaborated in a general way on the constructive work which could be done if there were only a central force to direct the work.

The Lodge has taken upon itself as a result of the last meeting to appoint a committee of five, the duties of which will be to make a complete and thorough investigation of the Jewish charitable organizations in the city and report back to the Lodge with recommendations. The Lodge realizes that it has anointed itself Charity Dictator, but feels that under the leadership of men who have been foremost in the charitable work of the city, it has a fair right to do so Some representative organization should have usurped this office some years ago.

President Frank, on behalf of the Lodge paid a glowing tribute to the character and work of Mrs. Ellis Brockow, who has served three terms as president of the Ladies' Auxiliary to the Los Angeles Lodge, who died early in the week.

Brother Salzman then introduced resolutions of condolence and with the unanimous approval of the brethren they were ordered spread upon the minutes and the secretary was instructed to send a copy to the family of Mrs. Brockow.

EMEK BERACHA LODGE, FORT WAYNE, INDIANA.

Emek Beracha Lodge, No. 61, of Ft. Wayne, Ind., held its annual meeting on Jan. 6. This meeting completed the twenty-fifth year of Bro. Charles Young's services to the lodge as secretary. In recognition of Brother Young's faithfulness, the members of the lodge presented him with a set of silver tableware. The presentation speech was made by Bro. Marx Frank, one of the two surviving charter members of the lodge. Other speeches of appreciation of Brother Young's work, were made by Bro. Isador Lehman, and Bro. B. M. Edlavitch.

At this meeting, the installation of officers for the ensuing year, took place. The following officers were installed:

President—S. K. Frankenstein.
Vice-President—Leo Schwartz.
Treasurer—Joseph Freiburger.
Secretary—Charles Young.
Monitor—B. M. Edlavitch.
Assistant Monitor—Rabbi A. L. Weinstein.
Guardian—Alvin M. Strauss.
Warden—Charles M. Wiener.
Trustees—Marx Frank, Leopold Freiburger and Julius Nathan.

B'NAI B'RITH OF PORTLAND

The B'nai B'rith Building has thrown open its doors for the benefit of the men in the army and navy or in any part of the government service. Efforts will be made to do whatever possible for the comfort of the visiting men in the service of the United States.

The officers of the B'nai B'rith Youths' Auxiliary of Portland were installed on Jan. 22, 1918, by Grand President David N. Mosessohn. Grand Orator D. Solis Cohen delivered a most interesting address on the "Ideals of the Order".

An interesting and well-attended meeting greeted the new officers of Theodor Herzl Lodge No. 314 at their meeting Jan. 23, 1918. Judge R. G. Morrow of the Circuit bench opened the meeting with an entertaining and instructive address on the necessity of patriotism at this time. Under the good and welfare of the lodge Rabbi Jonah B. Wise made an appeal in behalf of the drive for Jewish War Relief and also spoke in highest terms of the Tacoma B'nai B'rith Clubhouse for Soldiers and Sailors.

At the last meeting of Oregon Auxiliary No. 2, Daughters of the Covenant, held on Tuesday evening, the lodge unanimously carried a motion to purchase a $200 Victrola for the B'nai B'rith Clubhouse at Tacoma as their donation to the building. The new officers were in charge at the meeting.

One of the largest gatherings ever attending a function at the B'nai B'rith Building was present at the joint installation ceremonies of Theodor Herzl and Portland Lodges, I. O. B. B., and Oregon and Jacob Bloch Auxiliaries, Daughters of the Covenant, on Tuesday evening, Jan. 8, 1918.

District Deputy Nathan Weinstein conducted the installation for the men's lodges and Ladies' Auxiliary Deputy Alex E. Miller conducted the ceremony for the ladies' lodges. Grand Orator D. Solis Cohen delivered the address of the evening and itensified the necessity of unity of action and unity of thought on the part of the Jewish people all over the world, and urged a greater membership for the B'nai B'rith as the foremost institution for attaining this end. Mr. Cohen's address was most inspiring.

Grand President David N. Mosessohn, who was to have delivered an address, spoke briefly, due to a severe headache. He touched upon the fact that the B'nai B'rith Clubhouse for Soldiers and Sailors in Tacoma will in a few days be opened, and on the increase in B'nai B'rith membership in Portland, which was practically doubled during the year just passed. In closing his brief remarks he asked Rabbi Jonah B. Wise to deliver a brief talk.

Dr. Wise delivered a most inspirational address on the significance to the Jews all over the world of the present war and the present status of the Jewish homeland.

Musical numbers interspersed between the addresses were rendered by Master Louis Kaufman, the young violin virtuoso, accompanied by Mr. Glisan, and soprano solos by Miss Eloise Hall, accompanied by Mrs. Hall. They were received with much enthusiasm. At the completion of the program dancing was indulged in until a late hour.

Standing committees of the Portland War Emergency Council have been named by Mayor Baker. Among those appointed are Ben Selling on the executive committee; D. N. Mosessohn, representing the B'nai B'rith; Isaac Slett, representing the B'nai B'rith Club, and a number of other well-known co-religionists of the city.

An interesting and well-attended meeting greeted the new officers of Theodor Herzl Lodge No. 314 at their meeting Jan. 18, 1918. Judge R. G. Morrow, of the Circuit bench, opened the meeting with an entertaining and instructive address on the necessity of patriotism at this time. Under the good and welfare of the lodge Rabbi Jonah B. Wise made an appeal in behalf of the drive for Jewish War Relief and also spoke in highest terms of the Tacoma B'nai B'rith Clubhouse for Soldiers and Sailors.

Under the auspices of the Social Service Committee of District Grand Lodge, No. 2, Jewish services were held at the Ohio Penitentiary at Columbus on Jan. 20, 1918, by Rabbi I. B. Jashenowski, who lectured on the subject "Moses and His Characteristics".

Mr. Meyers also spoke and in an interesting manner recited what the Jewish Welfare Society is endeavoring to do for the men behind prison walls.

The following Sunday, Rabbi Jashenowski held services in commemoration of the Jewish New Year of Trees. Several inmates made short talks expressing appreciation to the Rabbi for his many deeds of thoughtfulness in their behalf.

B'NAI B'RITH OF SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. Sidney Hotchner, a young business man of San Francisco and president of Golden Gate Lodge No. 129 of the B'nai B'rith, is probably the first member of the San Francisco lodges to join the United States expeditionary forces in France.

On Monday evening, Jan. 14, 1918, Unity Lodge No. 273 installed its officers for the ensuing year, Secretary I. J. Aschheim of the District Grand Lodge acting as installing officer. The ex-president, Brother B. Hart, was presented with a beautiful token in recognition of valuable services rendered by him to the lodge.

The Columbia Auxiliary of the B'nai B'rith held its installation ceremonies on Monday, Jan. 14, 1918, with Mr. M. Block as installing deputy. Mrs. Kerske was mistress of ceremonies.

Golden Gate Lodge No. 129 held its installation of officers for the ensuing term of Jan. 16, 1918. District Deputy Brother Levinson officiated. At the conclusion of the ceremonies appropriate remarks and discussions were made by Brothers I. J. Aschheim, grand secretary, and Henry Newburgh, past president of the District Grand Lodge, and many other prominent members of the Order.

On Jan. 14, 1918, Cremieux Lodge, No. 325 installed its newly elected officers for the ensuing term. Past Grand President Harry K. Wolff acted as installing officer.

Immediately following the installation P. G. R. Harry K. Wolff favored the members with an address which was enthusiastically received by all. He dwelt largely upon the importance of increased activities as a means of obtaining a greater membership without which no organization can prosper. Past President Harry Geballe, who has recently returned from a visit throughout the East, spoke briefly in regard to the good work that is being done there by the various lodges.

The basketball team of the Leo N. Levi Youths' Auxiliary held an exhibition basketball game on Tuesday evening, Jan. 15, at the B'nai B'rith gymnasium for the benefit of the Red Cross.

Public installation of officers of Modin Lodge No. 42 was held on Jan. 8, 1918. Past Grand President Brother Henry Newburgh installed the officers. Members of the general committee were present. The social committee of the lodge spared no expense in properly entertaining the visiting Grand Lodge officers. At the close of the meeting refreshments were served and a general good time was had.

On Monday evening, Jan. 21, the Leo N. Levi Youths' Auxiliary of the I. O. B. B. celebrated its sixth anniversary with installation of officers for the ensuing term with an elaborate program. Mr. Saul Silverman was presented with a token in appreciation of his services to the auxiliary.

In San Francisco, as in practically every city of the Pacific Coast States, B'nai B'rith lodges are electing their delegates to the fifty-fifth annual convention of District Grand Lodge No. 4, to be held in Fresno, Cal., this month. Due to the war and the added obligations assumed by the B'nai B'rith, the coming session is destined to become one of the most important ever held by the District Grand Lodge. War relief, social service and kindred subjects are to be considered.

By the regular succession of officers, Richard E. Gutstadt, of San Francisco, now the first grand vice-president, is slated for election to the grand presidency for 1918. He will be the youngest grand president that the district has ever had.

For years Gutstadt has been a devoted worker in the B'nai B'rith and his election as chief executive of the Order in the West will be in the nature of a reward for loyal service.

Henry H. Hart, assistant city attorney of San Francisco and a past president of Unity Lodge of the B'nai B'rith, is the author of an interesting article on the life of the late Queen Lilauakalani, of Hawaii, which has just been published in the Overland magazine.

The article, replete with interesting sidelights of Hawaiian life and legend, is the result of an extended trip Hart made to the islands a year ago. He has since lectured extensively on the subject. His article is winning much favorable comment.

Golden Gate Lodge No. 129 is arranging for an entertainment on Feb. 20, 1918, in commemoration of George Washington's birthday. The meeting will be in the nature of a public meeting and the members, their families and friends will be cordially welcome.

An unusually excellent program is being arranged and a eulogy on George Washington will be delivered by a prominent member of the Order.

B'NAI B'RITH OF ST. LOUIS

The first meeting of Missouri Lodge, No. 22, St. Louis, Mo., for the year 1918, was held at Harburger Hall on Jan. 13, at which the following officers for the year were installed by Bro. Emil Mayer, Past President of District No. 2; Herman Cronheim, president; Aaron Romansky, vice-president; Abe L. Levi, monitor; Henry Oppenheimer, assistant monitor; Arnold Lowenstein, recording secretary; Henry A. Steiner, financial secretary; Abraham Arbetter, treasurer; E. S. Swarts and Sol Stampfer, warders. Jeff Wall, Sam Werner, Emil Mayer, trustees; Harry Simon and Jos. Stampfer, board of relief. The installing officer complimented Brother Levi on his manner of conducting the office of president for the past year and then Brother Cronheim assumed the duties of the office, and on account of the early closing order of the National Fuel Administrator business was expedited, but quite a few important matters were disposed of, among which was, by a unanimous vote, an appropriation of $600 to the War Sufferers Fund, and at the request of the Constitutional Grand Lodge it was also voted to add for the duration of the war an additional dollar to the dues for soldiers' and sailors' welfare work. A motion was also made that an amount of $500 be given to the Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare Fund, which will be passed on at the next meeting.

There were several candidates initiated and quite a number of other items of importance were disposed of.

The meeting was well attended, although quite a number of the membership were present at the meeting of the United Charities held the same evening.

A meeting of Missouri Lodge No. 22, was held Sunday evening, Jan. 20, at which Abr. L. Levi presided until Bro. Emil Mayer installed the officers for 1918. Herman Cronheim, the new president, then assumed his duties and in an able manner conducted the meeting of the evening. Several candidates were initiated and various items of unusual interest to the lodge were discussed. A Contribution to the Jewish War Relief fund of $600 by unanimous consent was voted for this worthy cause.

A special meeting will be called for the purpose of considering further contributions to soldiers' and sailors' welfare fund and war relief. Members will show their zeal for the order by being present and by doing their share of whatever we may be called upon to do.

MASSACHUSETTS LODGE, BOSTON, MASS.

The public installation of officers of Massachusets Lodge No. 27 of Boston, Mass., was held at the Hotel Brunswick Wednesday evening, Jan. 23, 1918.

The affair was most successful, being attended by about two hundred people, all of whom thoroughly enjoyed themselves. The meeting was opened by President Jacob Wasserman, who, after a few words of welcome, turned the meeting over to Meyer J. Sawyer, chairman of the special committee on arrangements. All arose and sang "The Star Spangled Banner".

An interesting program followed which included, in addition to the installation, songs by Miss Phoebe Wolf, accompanied by Miss Daisy Wit; recitations by Miss Winifred Collat; violin solos by Miss Esther Charak, and "Echoes From Hawaii" by Miss Adele Shalit and Miss Dorothy Golden.

The speakers included Judge A. K. Cohen, past president of District Grand Lodge No. 1; Mr. Shapiro, of New London, Conn, second vice-president of District Grand Lodge No. 1; Sol. Scheinfeldt, president of Amos Lodge; Captain Lewis Landes, of General Hodges' staff at Camp Devens, and Lieutenant Millmen of Camp Devens

The officers were installed by Dr. M. M. Eichler, after which the president-elect, Franklin M. Cohen, spoke briefly of his plans for the ensuing year. He commented on the world-wide scope of the work of the B'nai B'rith showing that the widow, the orphan, the aged, the infirm, and the sick were being taken care of by the Order, not only throughout the United States, but throughout Europe, and that therefore the B'nai B'rith has a right to expect and demand its share of communal support.

Mr. Cohen appealed for an increase in membership, and urged the members to support the good set of newly elected officers.

Past President Herman presented a cane, suitably engraved, to retiring President Wasserman, commenting on his efficient work and stating the love and respect that the members of Massachusetts Lodge held for Mr. Wasserman. Representative Wasserman replied showing his appreciation.

After the collation and the singing of "America", the gathering dispersed.

B'nai B'rith of Chicago

Central B'nai B'rith Council.

The annual meeting of the Central B'nai B'rith Council of Chicago was held at the Covenant Club Hall on the evening of Jan. 22, 1918, with the usual large attendance. The various officers and chairmen of standing committees submitted annual reports which were read and ordered referred to the Convention of the District Grand Lodge.

Election of officers was a special order of business and resulted in the following brethren being chosen to their respective offices: President, Dr. Harry Kraus; vice-president, Benj. Samuels; secretary, J. J. Gusfield; treasurer, A. B. Seelenfreund; executive committee, the officers above mentioned, Edward Sonnenschein, Israel Cowen, Dr. H. I. Davis and the chairman of all standing committees.

From the reports submitted it appeared that the Council was active during the year in the maintenance of the B'nai B'rith Free Employment Bureau at a cost of $2,500, it participated in the maintenance of a summer camp for poor Jewish boys at a cost of $2,300, was active along lines of social service by maintaining a special department for Big Brother work at an expense of nearly $2,500, and was instrumental in a large degree along propaganda lines to increase membership of the Chicago lodges.

The military minstrel show, entitled, "Over There", which Ramah Lodge will present at the LaSalle Hotel on Sunday evening, Feb. 24, 1918, promises to be one of the most successful amateur entertainments ever given in the city. Rehearsals assure those in charge of the entertainment that it will surpass similar entertainments ever given in the country.

The play was written by Dave Wolf, who is also directing the staging of it. Musical numbers are under the direction of Miss Elsa Meyerson.

At the close of the play, dancing will be indulged in.

David Fish Lodge.

One of the most successful meetings of David Fish Lodge No. 130, was held January 21, 1918, at the Covenant Club. A class of ten candidates was initiated by the Degree Team of the lodge. A number of new candidates were proposed.

The feature of the meeting was the installation of officers by the President of the District, Bro. Edward Sonnenschein, who after the ceremony addressed the lodge on the aim and objects of the Order.

Covenant Club.

On Saturday night, Jan. 26, 1918, members of the Club took part in the season's newest novelty, "Rocky Gulch in the Days of '49". With proper scenic equipment the club rooms were turned into a replica of a mining camp in California as it was in the days of '49.

The "Get-to-gether" luncheons on Saturday are proving a great success. On Feb. 2, 1918, Hon. Anthony Czarnecki, correspondent and lecturer with the Chicago Daily News, discussed "Poland and the War". On Saturday, Feb. 9, 1918, Hon. Quinn O'Brien spoke on the subject, "Lincoln's Message to the World Today".

The Entertainment Committee has announced two formal affairs during the month of February, one on Tuesday, Feb. 12, Lincoln's Birthday, and the other on Friday, Feb. 22, Washington's Birthday.

The annual meeting of the Covenant Club will be held on the second Thursday in the month of March. On the evening preceding the annual meeting, the election of officers and directors will take place.

Ramah Lodge.

The first meeting of the new term of Ramah Lodge No. 33 was held at the Covenant Club Hall on Jan. 14, 1918. The attendance was unusually large and special features of the meeting were the initiation of a class of thirty-seven candidates, presentation of reports of the officers for the year 1917, and installation of officers for the ensuing term.

Reports of the officers showed the Lodge to be in a most healthy condition both from a standpoint of finances as well as membership. The net gain in membership during the year, 1917, was over three hundred, and resources of the lodge have also materially increased.

The lodge was honored by the presence of Brother Moses Mosessohn of Portland, Oregon, a member of District Grand Lodge No. 4, who installed the officers and addressed the lodge, complimenting it on its activities and the healthy spirit manifested.

Various war activities found a most responding echo in the lodge and among its members.

The various committees appointed to aid the government in connection with Red Cross, Liberty Loan Campaign and Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare Work submitted elaborate reports showing that the members of the lodge have taken a most vital interest in all these activities and plans were discussed for the continuation of this work during the present year.

B'nai B'rith Cemetery Association.

The annual meeting of the B'rith B'rith Cemetery Association of Chicago was held in the month of January, 1918. Reports of the officers showed the Association to be in a most flourishing condition.

As a result of the large volume of business transacted during the past year, the Association unanimously voted to declare a dividend of $40.00 per share for all outstanding stock and checks were ordered drawn for these amounts and to be forwarded to the Chicago lodges, the holders of shares in the Cemetery Association.

All retiring officers were unanimously re-elected for the ensuing term.

HARMONY LODGE, BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

NEW ORLEANS LODGES CELEBRATE B'NAI B'RITH DAY.

B'nai B'rith Day was observed by the New Orleans lodges on Jan. 15, 1918, when Mr. Sigmund Livingston, of Bloomington, Ill., who heads the Anti-Defamation League and the B'nai B'rith Committee for Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare, delivered a fine lecture on the subject, "The Jew in Public Opinion".

Mr. Livingston first described the great power of public opinion; that it destroyed armies, and was responsible for every great advance. "No child of the race of men has suffered more from public opinion than the Jew", he said.

Tracing Jewish persecution in general terms from the distant ages to the present time, Mr. Livingston told of how every calamity was charged to the Jew. He was charged with creating the Black death that devastated Europe. Step by step, they were the victims of intoleration, until God, in his wisdom, established the great Western world as a haven for all persecuted people. The first opposition to the Jew was religious intolerance, then came economic jealousy and bitterness, and the third, persecution was social ostracism, the last extending even to this country.

Then came the organization of the Anti-Defamation League, which from the first has had the support and cooperation of the B'nai B'rith. The work of the league has been successful beyond the most sanguine expectations during the three years it has been going on, declared Mr. Livingston. He described how the first steps were to protest against the Jew being maligned and mischaracterized in the moving pictures. How the magazines were asked to refrain from publishing unjust articles and how the press had willingly responded, and rules as to the proper use of the words Jew, Judaism and Hebrew were formulated.

Mr. Livingston declared that of the hundreds of appeals made there was not a single case that was not either corrected or apologized for, and he found that it was never actuated by malice. It was all due to ignorance or misunderstanding of the true character of the Jew. Mr. Livingston pointed out how the minds of children are poisoned against the Jew even in "Mother Goose" nursery rhymes, and the league has succeeded in having these expurgated It has even accomplished the result of having "The Merchant of Venice" eliminated as a study for pupils in schools and colleges.

But, the speaker said, there rests upon the Jew the obligation to maintain the highest standard, so that he will not be subject to criticism. Mr. Livingston said his father used to say that a Jew had to be pure gold to be taken for silver, and the Jew that failed to live up to the standard of clean hands and pure heart was doing double injury, as he injured himself and his people at once.

Making an appeal for the soldiers' aid, Mr. Livingston said there will be a great burden on charitable institutions after the war. He also said there are no Jewish soldiers in the army, but more than 60,000 American soldiers of Jewish faith.

Rabbi E. W. Leipziger opened the meeting and then called Ralph Schwarz, President of District No. 7, to the chair. Mr. Schwarz delivered a short address on the work of the Order.

Mrs. B. Kokosky, accompanied by Mrs. Meyer Prince, entertained with vocal solos. A. Frisch, accompanied by Mrs. M. Rosenthal, rendered violin solos and dancing followed.

The bowling facilities at the B'nai B'rith Building have been greatly improved of late and the alleys are now among the finest in the city. An invitation has been issued to local clubs to hold their practice and tournaments at the B'nai B'rith. The secretary will supply any further information.

Through a gift to Cleveland Lodge, B'nai B'rith, from Mr. Emil A. Stotter, the establishment of a community center in connection with the B'nai B'rith headquarters at Euclid Avenue and East Seventy-First St., comparing favorably with any Jewish social center in the country, is practically assured.

Mr. Stotter has agreed to give to the organization the stone building on Euclid Avenue, just east of the present B'nai B'rith Building. The property has been leased by Mr. Stotter and the improvement he is planning includes the removal of the structure now located on the lot.

Mr. Stotter will permit Clevelan Lodge to use the structure now locate on his property as an addition to th B'nai B'rith Building. If plans no under consideration are followed it wil be moved from its present site to th portion of the B'nai B'rith lot in th rear of the present building. Befor this is done a stone barn must be removed. A swimming pool would b built in the basement of this new addition and above it would be located model gymnasium fully equipped. Th structure which Mr. Stotter has agree to give the B'nai B'rith was built at cost of about $50,000. In common with other Jewish lodges and societies in Charleston, Dan Lodge will not hold its February meeting in order to conserve fuel. While little fuel is saved on this one meeting, it was thought wise to enter the movement, since by the co-operation of all the organizations a great many meetings were called off and a considerable saving effected. In this connection, it may be stated that Brother Past President J. M. Visanska is Fuel Administrator for Charleston County.

At the next meeting of the lodge there will be a debate on the query, "Will the Russian Revolution Be Beneficial to Judaism"? treating of Judaism strictly from the religious side. It is planned to have a series of debates and discussions on questions of current importance to the Jewish world.

The members of Dan Lodge deeply regretted the abandonment of the District Grand Lodge convention, which was to have been held in Charleston in January. The Lodge had prepared to entertain the visiting brethren and was looking forward with much pleasure to having them.

Brother Manning J. Rubin, former secretary of Dan Lodge, is now in the office of the War Savings Committee for South Carolina, handling the publicity work of the organization. Brother Sidney Rittenberg, secretary of the lodge, is State Director of Publicity for War Savings.

Brother Past President Montague Triest has been appointed Assistant Food Administrator for Charleston County.

Brother Arthur V. Williams is serving efficiently as secretary to Mayor T. Y. Hyde, of Charleston.

Brother Louis M. Shimel is one of the Four Minute Men of Charleston.

Brother J. M. Visanska was recently elected a director of the Charleston Chamber of Commerce to succeed himself.

An unusually well-attended meeting of the lodge was held Sunday, Feb. 3, 1918. A large class of candidates was initiated by the degree team of the lodge.

PUEBLO LODGE, PUEBLO, COLO.

By Morris A. Penter, Secretary.

To the people of the East we Westerners are to a certain extent a band of outlaws or wild Indians, but if you will loan us your ears a moment we will try and educate you to the fact that we are as wise and as good hearted as our Eastern neighbors. The cry of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare Association reached us when the lodge was on its last uppers. A few of the old-time members got together and put some life into the lodge, and, thanks to them, it is humming on merrily again. Referring to the Welfare Association again, will say that in our lodge room, with an attendance of sixteen members, over $150 was raised and a campaign launched that when completed will make some of our Eastern neighbors that are much larger than we are bow their heads in shame. At our meeting on Jan. 20 the newly elected officers were installed. The new officers are as follows: Herman Berliner, president; Alfred Herman, vice-president; Ignatz Stark, treasurer; Morris A. Penter, secretary; Samuel Pepper, trustee; Dr. B. M. Steinberg, monitor; Isadore Rosen, Guardian. Brother L. D. Koretz, past president, was the installing officer.

VANCOUVER, B. C.

An impressive ceremony was witnessed at the installation of officers of Samuel Lodge No. 668, I. O. B. B., on Wednesday evening, Jan. 2, at the Labor Temple. The district deputy, Brother Max M. Grossman, prepared the lodge for the installation, and then appointed Immediate Past President Arthur H. Fleishman as installing officer. As each officer assumed his respective office, he pledged his undivided support to the fellow-officers and the lodge as a whole.

After the installation two candidates were initiated.

On the same evening the Samuel Auxiliary was busy formulating plans for a successful year. It was decided to have installation of officers at a later date in the month. This year will mark the most successful year ever experienced by the auxiliary, this being greatly due to the fine set of officers selected. One of the first important steps to stimulate interest in the auxiliary was the decision to hold fortnightly socials in the homes of the various members, the first of the series of which was held at the home of the president, Mrs. J. S. Bernet, on Sunday afternoon, Jan. 6. The Jewish community is looking forward to great things from the auxiliary.

At the close of the meeting refreshments were served.

HOPE LODGE, STOCKTON, CAL.

The annual meeting of Hope Lodge No. 126 of Stockton, Cal., was most spirited and proved the best meeting of the lodge during the past year. The report of the lodge submitted by its officers showed that a prosperous year in the annals of the lodge had just passed.

The lodge added twenty members to its roll. Financially it has also progressed, for even with unprecedented donations and expenses due to the war and other causes, the lodge showed a gain in its financial standing.

Besides financial contributions, the lodge has given liberally of its manpower. Seven members of the lodge are now in training camps and one member is on the District Board of Appeals. To each one of its members in training camps the lodge sent a box of goodies for Chanukah. The lodge also donated $125 to the War Sufferers' Fund.

Toledo Lodge is to follow a new policy regarding its programs during 1918. The intellectual advancement committee plans to have only one speaker a month; in every case some prominent leader in the community, even if it sometimes becomes necessary to go outside of the lodge membership. For example, at the Feb. 12 meeting, Toledo Lodge enjoyed a talk on Russia by Mr. Nevin O. Winter, an attorney who has traveled widely and written a number of books on his impressions of foreign lands.

BENEVOLENCE BROTHERLY LOVE AND HARMONY

World Democracy and Human Federation

By LUCIUS L. SOLOMONS

(Public address delivered at Civic Auditorium, Fresno, Cal., Sunday evening, Feb. 17, 1918, at the 55th Convention District Grand Lodge No. 4, I. O. B. B.)

It is a happy coincidence, though a chance one, which places this reunion tonight precisely midway in point of time between two national holidays commemorative of the birth of those illustrious tribunes of the people, the greatest of Americans—champions of religious liberty, of civil rights, of world equality.

It was Washington who said:

"May the same wonder-working Deity who long since delivered the Hebrews from their Egyptian oppressors and planted them in a promised land; whose providential agency has lately been conspicuous in establishing these United States as an independent nation still continue to water them with the dews of heaven and make the inhabitants of every denomination participate in the temporal and spiritual blessings of that people whose God was Jehovah".

It was Lincoln who prayed that "all men everywhere might be free"! and who prophesied "a just and lasting peace among ourselves and with all nations".

Our organization is predicated upon an abiding faith in universal brotherhood. It is pledged to every article of that faith. It preaches equality; it practices fraternity; it pleads for human rights in every phase and form as the highest expression of both religious and national creed.

It is a sectarian society, but its works are not sectarian. They cover every corner of the earth—they embrace all the children of men.

For it is God's work, and God is not sectarian. The God of Israel is the God of all nations—those that are at peace and those that are at war. All faiths acknowledge Him—whether inspired by the cross of Calvary or born amid the thunders of Sinai, or on that mysterious mountain where Mohammed sat and dreamed. This confraternity is dedicated perforce to the service of Him who said:

"Behold, I have made of one blood all nations of men to dwell upon the face of the earth; and have fixed the bounds of their habitations".

At any other time than this I might be permitted to continue in that strain, attuned perhaps to loftier pitch, and under the spell of that larger brotherhood, which knows no country, knows no race and knows no creed—which makes the world its household and all mankind its children—that world—that household, and those children who equally should partake of the great sacrament of sovereignty at every national board.

But the times are singularly out of joint. Our beloved country is at war and fighting for the integrity of its national existence. We are compelled to narrow our horizon. Our attributes of brotherhood dare not be world-embracing at this time. Yet why? Virtue is not national, truth is not national. Liberty and justice are not national. The forces of righteousness are the heritage of our common civilization. So says the universal pacifist, and thus far he is right. But the concepts and the interpretations of those attributes of right, justice and liberty—of government, of ethics, of social philosophy, of civil polity and of all standards of human conduct are national. They are national at least to the extent of racial manifestations and distinctive character in every nation of people.

It is these ethical conceptions alone which create the wide distinction between radical internationalism and that no less lofty but more conservative standard of altruism which we call national brotherhood.

We intend no modification of our pledge of world democracy. But there are two kinds of democracy as there are several kinds of brotherhood. Political democracy is one thing. Ethical democracy is another. In the minds of the protagonists of both there should not exist and there does not exist any sentiment which in the remotest degree can be classified as a prejudice against any race or nationality of mankind. Their sympathies have always been so truly cosmopolitan as often to produce the appearance of a lack of patriotism. I say "appearance" because in their ultimate analysis there is no inconsistency between the highest patriotism and the broadest humanity. National partisanship is not patriotism. Imperialism on this or the other side of the sea is not patriotism. The altruistic, not the egoistic scale of harmony furnishes the keynote to national brotherhood. But why only national brotherhood? Let us see.

One-half of this twentieth century civilization is locked with the other in an embrace of death. It has not been war upon the other side. It has been murder made easy, murder transformed into a fine art. And now that we are about to take our share in all these horrors—an enforced participant in this slaughter-fest, there can be but one cry upon our lips as there is but one emotion in our hearts—American loyalty, American unity and brotherhood. "God has made of one blood all nations of men, but has fixed the bounds of their habitations". Within the bounds of our habitation, therefore, I venture to plead for the honor of the family. Yet just as the exemplification of real religion is not so much to emphasize man's kinship with God as to proclaim man's kinship with mankind, so the love of country which does not embrace at the same time and in the same degree the love of one's countrymen is no more to be compared to the exaltation of true patriotism than is the worship of idols to be likened to the worship of the living God.

The birth of American patriotism is coeval with the birth of democracy. It long antedates the revolution. Was it not the protest against tyranny which first colonized the wilderness of this western continent—a wilderness ultimately transformed into those thirteen principalities, even then a republic in embryo, and symbolized by the thirteen golden stripes upon our banner? It was the love of liberty, civil and religious, and the hatred of despotism that braved the perils of the deep, subdued the forest and fought with savage beasts and savage men. Freedom of conscience in the individual, self-government in the multitude—these the cornerstone of new-world civilization, on which was reared the sovereignity of these United States. Between the two extremes of political hypocrisy—a tyranny under pretense of paternalism, and often tempered by the torch of anarchy; and anarchy itself in the guise of brotherhood, stands the great modern republic, as nearly ideal as the frailties of man permit, liberty its creed, its crest, its coronet—but liberty bridled by law, not license.

National brotherhood means more than popular sovereignty, more than liberty, more than equality. Why do we subscribe to the sentiment "Our country right or wrong"? For we do subscribe to it—sometimes with a mental reservation which wholly disappears in the face of national disaster. Why do we support and uphold our President, regardless of political antagonisms or personal predilections? It does not follow that we connive at misguided legislation or condone maladministration. It merely exemplifies that fidelity which filial piety would dictate in every relationship of life. It is that impulse which moves us to fly to the defense of those we love even in their misdeeds. Each of us, an integral part of its sovereignty, must answer for the nation's errors—errors for which the fallibility of the citizen is alone responsible. Popular government is but the collective conscience of its constituency. The stream of national life cannot rise above the level of its source. Thus, conscious that the national sin is the sin of all the people, we stand a united imperial citizenry before the bar of the world's judgment. That is patriotism.

Now let us look abroad.

For more than three years our allies have been made the victims of every conceivable form of fiendish barbarity, torture, outrage and mutilation practiced by the ancient savages, and supplemented by such diabolical devices as modern kultur can invent—their children fed to Moloch, their brave sons buried alive in trenches or drowned like helpless rats by undersea assassination, or converted by poisonous gases into pitiful wrecks of hopeless imbecility. Nor has the innocent, the unoffending or the non-combatant escaped the holocaust. Life, liberty, property, virtue, motherhood and helpless infancy—every sacred possession that Christendom affects to hold inviolate has been destroyed in the ruthless terrorism that follows in the wake of the Hun.

Truth is not national, freedom is not national, justice is not national; but the concrete national expression of those primitive virtues, in whose sacred name such God-defying crimes are committed alike by propagandists of German Kaiserism and exponents of Russian anarchy in Europe or America, is deserving only of utter annihilation; and while we pray that the tree of liberty may shoot its top to the sun, that its boughs may hang over the ends of the world; that wearied nations may lie down and rest in its shade, we shall rejoice to ornament the limbs of that tree with such choice specimens of international outlaws as those fiends of fanaticism abroad, or those other wild beasts of "direct action", the devil's disciples of anarchism here in this free land. For they are co-ordinating forces of frightfulness, brother brutes under their hideous hides "central allies" of world infamy; whether their emblazoned arms be crested by a Zeppelin Volante, a submarine Couchante or a loaded suit case rampant!

And yet the voice of the pacifist is still heard in the land calling for world peace parley. Parley with whom? With that imperial apostle of iniquity, compared to whom Nero was a saint and Caligula a deity? In the peril which confronts the world's civilization today there is no place for the pacifist—no room for him at the round table where sits the council of the allied nations—no seat at the banquet board of liberty.

We have sworn destruction to despotism. We have pledged this generation and mortgaged the next as security for world democracy. Our President has proclaimed our war aims—not our peace terms. Some kinds of peace are more destructive of manhood—more corruptive of the soul than war is of the body. Chains are worse than bayonets—shackles are more deadly than siege guns.

Peace is a jewel—yes, a jewel so precious that we may sacrifice anything for it save truth. Truth is more precious still. It is the signet ring of God; and the jewel of peace is dearly bought when exchanged for the jewel of truth. Shall we be false to our manifestos of human rights thundered forth to a listening world 140 years ago with the creation of the first republic of modern times? Let treacherous Russia, revolutionary or reactionary—whichever segment of her hybrid population may for the moment turn the scale of power—let Russia, disrupted, dishonored and discredited among her bleeding allies, seek whatever form of safety her craven conscience may approve. We who have taught the world its best lessons of liberty know well that no real peace was ever won from fate by diplomatic subterfuge or temporizing truce. Nothing can bring peace to the world but the triumph of principle.

When Benjamin Disraeli went forth as England's premier to the Berlin Conference in 1878, the parting injunction to him from the people of England was like the Spartan mother's to her son, "Return with your shield or upon it". "Bring back peace with honor or throw down the gage of battle". And when that veteran of bloodless wars returned and said, "I have brought you peace with honor", the cheers that echoed round the world of British Empire were once for peace but twice for national honor.

The cause of universal freedom! What arms or armaments can hope to prevail against it? Autocracy has gone to war; and in the face of advancing civilization what the conscience of mankind can no longer uphold in principle the sword of a thousand conquerors cannot defend against sure death. Victory and peace! But victory first and peace afterwards.

For these desiderata we Israelites solemnly take our place as comrades and compatriots among the sovereign citizenry of our common country. The martyr race—we keep a tryst with ancient memories and dare invite once more a partnership with death. Does this display of martial spirit call forth the reminder that for 3,000 years it has been our boast that we are the pioneers of peace and brotherhood? True! but back of that we were the forerunners of freedom.

"I am the Lord, thy God", declares the very first commandment, "who brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage".

And following that pronouncement the same dread voice called out from Sinai's height:

"Then shalt thou cause the trumpet of jubilee to sound and proclaim liberty throughout the land unto all the inhabitants thereof; and ye shall return every man unto his possession".

How have the happy fates conspired to redeem that pledge?

On the 25th of Kislev, 2,000 years ago, our altars were profaned by the Syrian tyrant—our temple desecrated. Three years later, on the same 25th of Kislev, Judas Maccabaeus overcame Antiochus, rebuilt those sanctuaries and relit the fires of our national faith in the dedication of the Feast of Lights. Behold once more upon that 25th of Kislev, the natal day of Israel's deliverance, but 2,000 years thereafter, the British army under General Allynby marched through the portals of the sacred city, caused the trumpet of jubilee once more to sound and proclaimed liberty throughout the land unto all the inhabitants thereof Christian, Mohammedan and Jew, to abide in peace beside the altars of their faith—cathedral, mosque or synagogue.

Is there no trace of the hand of destiny in these recurrent episodes? Can the world wonder that we rejoice to raise up another Maccabean band, with shoulders braced against the mountain wall, to meet the onslaught of the modern Syrian host, this new Antiochus, and to cry out with Judas of old:

> "Who is like unto thee,
> O Lord among the mighty"!

Is the fulfillment of the Zionistic dream concealed here somewhere? Perhaps it is; but a many-sided Zionism, a multiplied Utopia, this aspiration. There are those who visualize therein the birth of international brotherhood—"the parliament of men, the federation of the world", the theme of modern poets, or the golden age of light and love of which the ancient prophets sung. Not the Zionism of political necessity; not the Zionism of economic expediency. To meet world recognition it must be founded upon social more than racial brotherhood—a nationalism rather than a nationality. As for cultural Zionism, a spiritual empire does not depend on territorial limitations; for her "all place a temple and all season summer" until Israel has earned that promise of salvation which heralds the approach of the Messianic reign.

But with all reverence for the builders of our own great republic and deeper reverence for the Supreme Builder who established the work of their hands, we

THE PHILOSOPHY OF A PROLETARIAN

By a Peaceful Workman

Translated from the Yiddish by H. Eliassof

Two Yiddish pamphlets, "The Philosophy of a Proletarian", and "Our Unity Problem", written by a peaceful workman, have recently appeared in print. These pamphlets contain a number of articles on timely topics, which express a wealth of truth in a forceful and unique manner. The author unfolds a homely philosophy and his style may appear to some fragmental, too abrupt, aye, even too bold. But the reader cannot escape from being impressed with the author's earnestness and sincerity. He undoubtedly echoes the voice of the Jewish masses, and deserves a patient hearing in the intelligent Jewish circles. I therefore present a selection of these articles, in English translation, to the readers of the B'nai B'rith News.

THE TRANSLATOR.

Fore word and Systematic explanation.

I am a patient in the Beth Israel (House of Israel) Hospital, one of the innumerable masses who are dissatisfied with the prevailing condition; I speak out openly and express that which we all carry in the depth of our hearts.

The system of the doctors who want to cure us does not please us; some of them torture us with medicines and operations, which not only do not heal, but increase the pain.

Some modern doctors, specialists in the world-disease, have another advice for us: they are of the opinion that we should first try to have entire humanity cured and in the end our own afflictions will also be relieved, it is not necessary to pay special attention to our own pain.

This advice we are even less able to accept, because we look upon this subject with open eyes.

We know the world-illness just as well as we know our own, we assert: the world's help depends upon our own deliverance, with our peace we bring peace for all mankind.

We possess in our own selves beams of light which are being obscured by the dark clouds with which we are surrounded, when these rays shall be gathered into one united light upon our own sky, then we can bring a balmy brightness, which shall have the power to heal the wounds of us all.

The worldly man has lost himself in the beast, our brethren in the environment.

How do we find ourselves again, shall we wait until the beastly creatures shall come to their senses, or man shall really progress?

My opinion is that when we will succeed first in finding the free historical Jew out of the goluth slavery, then the worldly man will of course find his way, otherwise I see little hope for us all.

When we are paralyzed, the world misses an important force. with our revival we bring into it a new life energy. This is the real condition: the world needs our help no less than we are in need of its support.

The physical structure of society, the mechanical organization has developed gigantically, the psychological side is very weak; the moral forces are exhausted.

We Jews possess these forces in considerable measure; when our scattered forces, which lose themselves in the environment will be gathered into a united power, then we can bring the desirable help for all sufferers.

We can maintain that the question of our liberation is a vital question also for all mankind.

Upon the order of the day of history next to the question of the revival of the people of Israel, stands also the question of the peace of the whole world.

We must meditate earnestly upon this fact.

Many hopes are being placed upon the assembly of the diplomats which will take place after the war will end. I will ask: would it not be more expedient for us to be more time-saving and not wait so long until the whole world shall be totally ruined?

We can also doubt the stability of the peace which can be brought with the power of the sword, or through the art of the diplomats.

The political ways bring little success, the moral forces of the people can aid more to attain it.

It would be more advisable to create a moral peace movement which shall be supported less by political and more by moral forces.

The conditions of a lasting peace should be worked out by modest men with peaceful aspirations. this is the safest way which would be able to bring peace nearer.

When we should be united we could take upon ourselves the task to serve the world as peace-mediators, as parliamentarians to pave the way.

This is an important historical problem to which we must give careful attention.

This I will talk over with you in my written word; I will call to all broken men and crushed souls, come closer one to the other.

To our own family I will come with a stronger word.

I will summon all parties and groupings, the orthodox as well as the reformers, the conservatives as well as the liberals, and tell them: do not throw the guilt one upon another; we are all sick; upon each member of the body a different efflorescence marks the skin, let us take this to heart; instead of disdain and chagrin, let us seek to strengthen and to respect each other.

We must seek out the man, the brother and our own "ego", all in cohesion, separated, singly we become paralyzed.

The perfect man is also a perfect brother and a perfect individual personality. Whereas, the crippled individual paralyzes also the brother and the man.

As in the life of the individual, so also in the life of groups we see the same things; the separation of one member from the other brings deadly results, life means unity and harmony.

We lack a universal view in regard to the physical grouping and we also lack a general conception in regard to the psychological relations which we all have in common; we must look upon the whole body with wider opened eyes.

I am coming to a close; when we place ourselves a step higher above partiality and one-sidedness, we make the first step towards the deliverance from goluth.

We furthermore must seek our historical ways.

With business caprices and politics we can attain mighty little.

We must find a way in real life, orderly, systematic, the condition of goluth slavery shall be altered, the business methods shall gradually be made over into a higher standard which shall lead to freedom and all-sided perfection.

This is the safest means that can heal our wounds and bring peace into our house.

I wish to have an understanding with you about the only way which can lead us to it, in few words and much meaning.

At the same time you will find an original method, how to become clear with your own self, so that your ideas shall become crystallized.

When you will take time to think it over according to this rule which I give you here, you will find your way out of the chaos which surrounds us.

I will help you to a rebirth of your own thoughts and feelings, which I wish to become one corporeal substance with real work.

I am weary of thought gymnastic, souls that hover in the heavens only and have little connection with the earthly body can bring us little help.

At the close I ask you that we should make one further step together: everyone of us and all in cohesion we shall help to bring into the light the general thought of our Jewish people which shall come accompanied by a common, lofty, and imposing deed.

The time is coming near when we will have to go out into the world, we shall step upon the tribunal of the nations to let our voice be heard. Let us appear upon the historical platform as men and as historically living Israelites.

I will close with the prophetic word: "Nakhpeso drokhenu .wenakhkorah" let us search through and investigate our ways, where are we in the world, whence do we come, where is our goal, and find out whether our life has not a higher meaning?

The position is dangerous; the people of Israel lies upon the sick-bed, it finds it hard to move; we lack peace, freedom and revival; we need freedom before everything; how do we find it in practical life?

It will not come by itself, we must seek it with all our might; it is a hard task but a necessary one; it is an easier job to stick to wars and wrangling, but their fruit does not well agree with us; the cultivation of the vineyard of peace demands more exertion and will-power, will we overpower our weaknesses?

We must learn to know the historical ways according to which the whole social life is being regulated; we must also learn to know closer the fixed character lines of the true peace, so that we make it our companion, bring it into our house, also into the wide world.

If you really wish to accomplish this and to renew our historical creative force, you must be wide awake, not sleeping now; when we shall earnestly seek peace we will find it and our historical future is safe and secure.

FIRST ARTICLE.

The Bankruptcy of Civilization and the Ways for the Restoration of Credit-Capacity.

I have claims upon modern civilization: it has promised us so much and paid so little; it is to be compared to a despotic mistress who prepares for her subjects a merry ball with artistic inventions of articles of luxury and voluptuousness.

At the same time she provides them with modern means of destruction and infernal machinery; she lets the people make merry for a short time, permits them to indulge to their hearts' desire and then she sends them to engage in a devilish dance, a wedding of blood, They are punished for their frivolity.

I think that it is about time to break the bonds of slavery.

Entire humanity is in goluth (exile), and our people in particular experiences a double exile; an interior and an exterior goluth process.

Will humanity ever gain the recognition that conditions cannot remain as they are?

Things must take a turn for the better.

Since ancient times we carry in us the thought of redemption, which finds expression through the well-known peace idea of the Jewish prophets.

The modern world has lately taken up the thought that wars shall cease in the world. But this idea is not thoroughly fathomed; the outward battles are nothing more than a result, a consequence of the inward chauvinism; it is a volcanic eruption which is to be traced back to the inner fire. If you want that the volcano shall cease its destructive work, then you must see to it that the subterranean fire which burns without ceasing shall become quieter.

It is not possible in any other way.

Here we come to the source of all the troubles of the children of man.

Where do the battles come from? They come from this: each individual. looks for the faults of his companion, he finds a cause to hate, finally also a reason to beat the other.

The account is very clear.

When every individual hates and beats the next one the consequence is that all are being beaten, it is an all-sided butchery.

Would it not be more reasonable for humanity not to be so blind and open the eyes to see the inner disease and to find a way by which the wounds, which are so frightful, shall be healed?

We have also revolutionists who cannot endure the bad order which is to be found in the world and they are therefore of the opinion that they can break the power of authority with the same methods which are supported by force and physical might.

My opinion is that a better revolutionary method must be found which shall not depend upon physical but upon moral might.

I will have a better system which shall be just the opposite of the one which exists since the very beginning.

I want a radical change: the principle, "The aim sanctifies the means" I will not recognize, my principle is just the reverse of it, "A good aim with good means". My revolutionary methods consist of this principle.

I will furthermore propose two ways which shall lead us to the aim, an individual and a social.

The first is a revolution which every one can start with himself, a turning over which every individual can make in his own heart. How is that possible? Very simple:

The brain shall control the heart which has no good inclinations; the eyes shall come to the help of the man; to seek the good sides of the next man instead of the bad; every man has both sides in himself; as far as faults are concerned, every one has the opportunity to find them in himself consequently also to make them better.

The second way is I wish to have the better strivings of every individual to come to an expression through social institutions, which shall have the duty to begin with better practical experiments; just as in the plant world. When one wishes to produce something better, one makes use of experiment stations, the same thing can also be done in the field of sociological gardening.

The nations who surpass each other in work of destruction and annihilation, shall perceive that a better way can be found—a way of creative work and peaceful competition.

It is not necessary to wait long for it. It can be started this day, the sooner we begin the better it will be for us.

This thought I will propose to all mankind in general, and especially to my brethren, the children of Israel, because I think that they would be best fit for it and because I am of the opinion that place where they can make themselves useful is not in the trenches, also not upon the barricades, they can bring more benefit to humanity when they shall be independent.

I would say to the modern Pharaohs: "free your slaves"! Do not force our children to help you create ruins, they shall serve God, with it also humanity in their original way, according to the spirit of our prophets; our task must be to build worlds, not to annihilate.

We have learned enough of you, chauvinistic teachers, your wells are drained; this is a time when you must learn from us; we shall go in advance of the wôrld to be the torch-bearers of peaceful light.

We possess in ourselves the power to be not a curse but a blessing for humanity; give us the possibility for it.

THE JEW AND THE LODGE.

The idea of the lodge has vastly changed since the day of its original institution, itself lost in the mist of the ages. In our time, the business of the lodge is for social fellowship and good deeds, a splendid purpose and one to be encouraged. Of course, its labor is frequently abused, yet even this fact does not detract from the lodge's worth. Its lingering secret business grates on the sensitive nerves of those who understand the ancient need of secrecy and that in these times such is unnecessary; even so, the insistence on secrecy, anomalous and insignificant, does not depreciate the lodge's potentiality. Apart from certain religious discriminations in some quarters in lodges organized on non-religious, non-political, and all other non-devisive factors, discriminations, which contradict the lodges' fundamental constitution, the lodge has invaded the field of religion. Thus, we Jews have the Independent Order B'nai B'rith, the national and international mouthpiece of Jewry, irrespective of the national and religious differences of Jewry; and many other lodge bodies, catering to particular circles and existing successfully or precariously for endowment and benefit features.

The I. O. B. B., however, is the distinctly supreme Jewish lodge. It is the bounden duty of every Jew, worthy and honorable. to be identified therewith. Strange, however, it is that a large number of our coreligionists frown with disfavor on the Order, but seek to be identified with non-Jewish orders, even regard membership and in instances tolerance in the latter as a privilege. The Jew, in our opinion, who is not a Ben B'rith is not a fit subject or citizen for any of the non-Jewish lodges. We have known of Jews who have been accorded subordinate and even grand lodge honors in our Order, and have resigned in order to affiliate with non-Jewish orders, as if the latter would give them a neshamah yetherah, and condemned the Jewish order; or who have become sore-heads because they could not have their way, and quit, as if their loss would be any hurt. The time will come, and it is near at hand, when the Jew who is not a Ben B'rith will not possess any standing in Jewish life. Every city and town must have their congregation or congregations, but must also have their B'nai B'rith lodge, each giving and receiving strength from the other.—(Montague N. A. Cohen in the Portland Jewish Tribune).

BOLSHEVIKI CLOSE JEWISH PUBLIC KITCHENS.

Red Guards and soldiers sealed the stores of the Jewish Charitable Kitchen in Petrograd, because an appeal by M. Vinaver, urging the Jews to vote for cadet candidates for the Constituent Assembly, had been found on the premises during a prolonged search carried out by the chief of the guards. This action placed in a very difficult position the thousands of Jews and non-Jews who used to obtain food at the kitchen at reduced prices. Two hundred of the most deserving cases were served with free dinners daily. The action of the guards evoked a storm of protests.

Reform II Part.

The inner workings of historic forces are best understood not by intended information, but by occasional naive remarks. The same Jacob Emden who, while personally orthodox, promoted religious liberalism by his proof that the Zehar, the holy book of the cabbalists, was in part a forgery, preserves to us a small incident, which, small as it is, throws light on the growing emancipation from traditional beliefs.

On the eve of the Passover, 1760, a swarm of beggars appeared in the ghetto of Teplitz, the famous Bohemian health resort. These hoboes had become a regular pest, and no police regulations was able to stop it. It is an ancient evil in Jewish communal life. The Talmud already speaks of the "flying guests" (Orhe u-Forhe, Ketubet, 61a), whose care required a special servant in wealthy households. One of their tricks was to make their appearance in wealthy communities late on Friday afternoons or on the eve of holy days, when they were assured that they could not be turned away. So this swarm appeared in Teplitz on the eve of the Passover, 1760. The congregation had already more than its share of Schnorrers, but what was to be done? No Jew would turn a brother Jew away on this festival, when the ritual invites "everyone who is hungry to come and eat." Among the arrivals, a venerable looking man, dressed in the style of the Polish rabbis, attracted special attention. The president of the congregation provided him with lodging, for such a man could not be sent to the communal lodging house, the "Schlafstatt"—among our Russian coreligionists in the United States still surviving as "Hachnesath Orchim"—but excused himself that he could not invite him to the Soder, for he had already as many guests as his home could accomodate. Fortunately, an offer came unsolicited. A woman, whose husband had been called to Dresden on business shortly before the festival, heard that a rabbi had arrived in town, and she offered to invite him to her house, so that she could have a competent man to perform the function of the festival.

The stranger who called himself Rabbi Bezalel of Opatov, which later investigation proved to be an alias, recited the Haggadah. At the close of the ritual, when the wish is pronounced that "we may celebrate the festival next year in Jerusalem," the good woman repeated these words with deep emotion. Rabbi Bezalel smiled and said: "You still believe in that story." Naturally, great disappointment. The incident was reported. The man's effects were searched, and it was found that he had connections with the sect, established shortly before by the Polish Jew, Jacob Frank, who attempted to found a new religion through a combination of Judaism, Catholicism, and Islam, and in addition the pseudo-Bezalel, who traveled as a scribe, selling Tefillin, aroused such suspicion that his Tefillin were examined and were found to contain sawdust instead of the prescribed strips of parchment with the words from the Pentateuch. The trustees deliberated on the cause and sentenced him to have his beard cut and his gaberdine shortened in order that he should not deceive other innocent souls by his venerable appearance.

This by the way. The feature of the story which interests us is that long before the change in the ritual and a readjustment of the catechism was thought of, people had lost the naive faith in the promise that in some supernatural way God would send a man, endowed with supernatural powers to lead all Israel to the land of the fathers, and there re-establish the old kingdom of David in new, increased and never ending glory. It takes a long time in religion as in public life, before revolutionary theories are put into practice. So two generations passed before the negation of the doctrine of Israel's restoration to Palestine and of a personal Messiah was recognized in the service of any synagog.

The first case of this kind is found in Hamburg, where the "Tempel" was opened on the eighteenth of Oct., 1818, the trustees choosing deliberately the anniversary of the battle of Leipsic. to prove that they considered themselves not exiled Palestinians, but German citizens, professing the Mosiac religion. Political considerations had, however, long before worked a change in the rigid traditions of synagog worship. Such changes are always more readily tolerated, when they do not appear as principles, but are enacted as facts. The battle of Leuthen in 1757 was a decisive victory of Prussia over Austria. The whole population rejoiced, and the Jews could not afford to appear disloyal or even indifferent to the welfare of the country in which they lived. The congregation of Berlin ordered thanksgiving services, and wishing to make an impression on the non-Jewish public, the trustees requested Moses Mendelssohn to write a hymn for the occasion which was set to music and sung in the synagog. So services in the vernacular were introduced without the slightest opposition. This was no small concession. It took exactly sixty years before a similar move was made in England. The first sermon in English, preached in a synagog, was delivered in Liverpool, Nov. 17, 1817, on the occasion of a death in the royal family. The occasion for the departure from the traditional Yiddish was similar to that of Berlin. The Jew was exceedingly tenacious in his ritual life, even in matters which are not defined by law. Rabbi Judah Rapahael Israel in Nice aroused considerable opposition in 1789, when, probably under the influence of the excitement, created by the fall of the Bastile, he ordered the abrogation of the old custom to chant the Haftarah of the Sabbath preceding the Ninth of Ab in Spanish. This custom, introduced by Spanish exiles who settled in Nice in the sixteenth century, was no more Jewish than would have been a translation into Italian, but it was hallowed by tradition, and people clung to it, considering its abrogation a sacrilege.

Moses Mendelssohn was not a reformer. He does admit in his apology for Judaism, "Jerusalem," that there are laws which are dependent on time and environment, but he reserves their abrogation to a clear expression of divine will, and in a letter to Herz Homberg, he says, that, while laws may have lost their meaning as symbols, they still have to be maintained as the bond of union for Israel's household. Nevertheless the progress of secular education to which Mendelssohn had so prominently contributed, was a leaven which worked towards a modernization of public worship and other religious practices. Isaac Euchel (1756-1804), a native of Copenhagen, who lived as tutor to prominent families in Koenigsberg, published in 1786 a German translation of the prayerbook in the preface of which to which he says that his pupils complained that they could not recite the Hebrew prayers which they did not understand.

The main impetus to Reform, however, came from political conditions. It was said previously that immediately after the death of Frederick the Great in 1786, whose bitter prejudice against the Jews left no hope for improvement, the elders of the Berlin congregation petitioned the new king, Frederick William II, to alleviate their situation. The king who was sympathetic to the demand, referred the question to his cabinet (General department), which reported that the greatest obstacle in the way of improvement of the Jews was the rabbomical law (1787). This statement is repeated by another commission to which the next king referred the question in 1810. It is also emphasized in an address presented by the city of Strassburg, then under French administration, which objects most strenuously to the admission of Jews to the city, demanding that, if the Jews wish to become citizens, they must first tear down the walls "which separate them from us" (1790). The removal of the barrier between the Jews and their Christian neighbors was the main object of a still existing Jewish club, called "Gesellchaft der Freunde", established in Berlin, 1792, with the avowed purpose of abrogating the abuses "which prevent the progress of the Jews and lower them in the eyes of the Christian fellow citizens", (1792).

A bold step was taken shortly afterwards by one of the elders of the Berlin congregation, David Friedlander (1750-1834). This man has been unjustly dealt with by Graetz. Friedlander, the son of a wealthy family of Koenigsberg, which possessed special privileges, placing them on a level with Christian merchants, married into the equally prominent family of Itzig, in Berlin, and established a silk manufactory there in partnership with his brother-in-law, Isaac Daniel Itzig. Born and bred in Koenigsberg, where at that time, Kant, the author of "Religion Within the Limits of Reason", taught, and living in Berlin, where under the influence of Frederick the Great, the Voltairian spirit was the fashion in society, Friedlander was an advocate of a religion which would drop all dogmas conflicting with the reason and all ceremonies which are obnoxious to people of modern culture. In this sense he wrote an anonymous pamphlet in the form of an epistle to a well-known liberal minister of Berlin, Dean Teller, 1799. His main point, briefly presented, is: You, Christians, including Protestant ministers of the type of Luler, Do not believe in Limity, in the Divinity of Jesus, in Bodily Resurrection, in the Vicarious Atonement and the like. We, liberal Jews do not believe any more in the doctrines of the Talmud than you believe in those of the church fathers. Why can we not come together on a common ground? The pamphlet, published in 1799, created quite a sensation. Graetz presents the story so, as if Dean Teller had been provoked by these radical doctrines and by the obtrusiveness of the Jews who wanted to become Christians without accepting the fundamental doctrines of Christianity. Close study of the literature of that time leaves almost no doubt that Teller had arranged the whole thing in order to have an opportunity to present his own liberal ideas of Christianity. Friedlander condemned apostasy, and it is fact that his own son did not convert to Christianity until after his father's death.

The radicalism of Friedlander could not have any lasting effect. As everywhere it was the man of the golden means who respected the force of historis sentiment that could bring about practical result. This man was Israel Jacobson (1768-1828), previously mentioned as one of the most successful promoters of secular education, who gave the first practical impetus to a reform of public worship. Jacobson, a wealthy banker, had moved to Cassel the capital of the kingdom of Westfalia, which Napoleon had patched up from various slices of the small German states for the benefit of his brother, Jerome. With the creation of the new kingdom in 1808 the French principle of liberty of religion and the organization of the Jewish communities under a central authority, called Consistory, was introduced. Jacobson was a strong believer in regeneration of Judaism by state's authority. He organized the consistory of Cassel of which he became president, and this body went to work right away in abolishing the rabbinical "abuses" according to homeopathic methods. Thea Passover laws were especially burdensome, owing to a rigorous interpretation and amplification in rabbinical works, not justified by either Bible of Talmud. So the president of the consistory, supported by the learned rabbis whom he had called into his council, decreed that the prohibition of rice, peas and beans on Passover, not based on old authorities should be abrogated. The effect on the Jewish community was about the same which the resolutions of the Central Conference of American rabbis on matrimonial laws, such as Get and Halizah had on the East side of New York and the West side of Chicago. The rabbis of Brunswick, Eger and Fuerth, declared this decision a rebellion against God's law, and even the consistory of France protested against it as an arrogation of authority.

The only practical way for religious progress was that which all reformers have chosen, that of doing something regardless of what ecclesiastic authorities would say. This was what Jacobson finally did. In his school at Seesen, he introduced organ, prayers in the vernacular and similar innovations, expecting that this form of worship, begun in a synagog frequented by young people, would in time be hallowed by tradition just as the older people the worship of the synagog of their youth had something sacred. Radicals like David Friedlander sneered at this moderation as a makeshift. In a letter to Aaron Wolfsohn (1754-1835) a member of the Mendelssohnian school who was engaged in writing a textbook for instruction in religion for the Jacobson school, Friedlander writes: These petty reforms of omitting a rabbinical passage, such as the treaty of the Sabbath lights (Bam meh Madlikin) from the prayerbook will do no good. Either the reconstruction of the old edifice must be entrusted to bold architects or it is best to let the old structure collapse completely and then begin a new building. It is significant that Friedlander changed his views soon afterwards. Prussia issued March 11, 1812, the edict which declared the Jews citizens, and Friedlander at once submitted to the minister a plan for introducing reforms in the service. This minister, Prince Hardenberg, a liberal, was inclined to lend to the scheme the moral support of the government, but king Frederick William, III, a narrow minded Lutheran, was unalterably opposed, even when the minister suggested that this expression of loyalty on the part of the Jews who felt they must do something to show to the king their appreciation, had no effect on him. He stuck to his principle that Jews must remain Jews or else turn Christians, and he acted accordingly.

The example of Seesen found imitation in similar institutions. The "Philanthropin" of Frankfurt a.M., previously described, was opened in 1804 with the purpose of putting Rousseau's principles into effect. The school should educate not Jews, but ideal human beings. Its first principal, Michael Hess (1782-1860), held on Sundays "edification meetings" without any regard for the traditional liturgy, beginning in 1812. Shortly afterwards, Joseph Johlson (1777-1851) was engaged as teacher of religion. He followed more traditional lines, and introduced regular Sabbath services with a liturgy, partly in Hebrew, partly in German, with hymns accompanied by a harmonium and other innovations, calculated to meet the aesthetic demands of the age. These services inaugurated in 1814, were often attended by grown people who in time became not merely visitors, but regular worshippers so that in 1828 a chapel (Andachtssal) was built which adopted the features of modern service which we know in America, uncovered head, instrumental music, prayer in the vernacular and abrogation of the woman's gallery. Similar were the conditions in Hamburg, where a free school was opened in 1817, and the services, held in connection with it, attracted an adult congregation which a year later organized itself as the congregation of the "Tempel".

With this we have anticipated the course of events, and have to go back to Johlson who in his textbook for religious instruction, published in 1814, pleaded for the establishment of consistories whose legislative power, he argued—and for this he had good Talmudic authority—would be equal to that of the ancient rabbis. The German federal government to whom he submitted this plan, indorsed it, and various German states ordered the book to be used as official textbook in Jewish schools. Conditions, however, soon changed, owing to the reactionary spirit which became the guiding policy of the German states after Waterloo. Jacobson, who before the French occupation had been a favorite of the duke of Brunswick, did not feel comfortable under the restoration of the old regime to which he had shown so little loyalty, and he moved to Berlin. There the field seemed to be even more promising. He arranged for services in his own parlor, and another wealthy banker, Jacob Herz Beer, the father of the composer Meyerbeer, did the same. The orthodox members of the congregation frowned upon these innovations, and they possessed the support of the government. Upon their appeal to the authorities that these services were an encroachment upon the privileges of the congregation which possessed corporate rights, the services were closed by royal order Dec. 9, 1815. The leading men in the Board of Trustees, like David Friedlander, were, however, sympathetic to the liberal movement and upon their plea that the synagog, undergoing alterations, was insufficient for the worshippers, the services were for a while resumed, but in 1823 a royal edict ordered that the services of the synagog had to be conducted according to the traditional style (althergebrachter Weise). This made an end of the Berlin reform movement, and its sympathizers looked elsewhere for a more favorable field.

Hamburg was a republic, autonomous in its local government, and therefore was chosen for the experiment. The governing senate had no objection to

Annual Convention of District Grand Lodge No. 4, I. O. B. B.

The Fifty-fifth annual session of District Grand Lodge No. 4 began on Sunday morning, Feb. 17, 1918, at Fresno, Cal., with President David N. Mosessohn presiding. The convention was opened with prayer by Rabbi Michael Fried of Sacramento, after which Louis Mendelson of Fresno delivered a short address of welcome.

The San Francisco committee of fifty presented to the Grand Lodge a service flag containing 250 stars. The presentation was made in behalf of the committee by Past Grand President Otto Irving Wise and President Mosessohn accepted it for the Grand Lodge.

The rest of the morning session was taken up by the reading of the president's report and the other officers of the Grand Lodge.

The report of the Grand President was well received. It was a lengthy document and brimful of Jewish sentiment. The major part of the report was devoted to the Soldiers' and Sailors' Club House at Tacoma, Wash., and contained a detailed statement of the negotiations, had with the representatives of the Jewish Board of Welfare Work, before the management of that institution was lodged in the hands of the B'nai B'rith.

In the afternoon memorial services were held for Past Grand President Sigmund Sichel and other brethren of the district who passed away during the past year. Past Grand President Lucius L. Solomons delivered the memorial address. Dr. Mosessohn of Portland recited the Kaddish.

In the afternoon there was an automobile ride through Fresno and in the evening while the delegates resumed their business, an organ recital was given at Hotel Fresno for the ladies.

OPEN MEETING AT CIVIC AUDITORIUM.

Sunday evening an open meeting was held at the Civic Auditorium, at which eloquent addresses were delivered by Otto I. Wise and Lucius L. Solomons, both describing the honors and sufferings of the Jews in the war zone. As a result of the stirring appeals about $5,000 was raised for Jewish relief fund.

MONDAY SESSION.

The second session of the convention opened on Monday morning and at noon luncheon was served at the Commercial Club for the delegates. The ladies were entertained at luncheon at Hotel Fresno, a card party following. Members of the Ladies' Auxiliary of Fresno acted as hostesses. At the morning and afternoon sessions, reports of various committees were received and considered.

REPORTS ADOPTED.

First: The special committee on "Orphanage Asylum in the Northwest" reported "that the present needs and demands for such an institution are not such as to warrant or justify the creation of one".

Second: The usual necrology on the demise of members of the Grand Lodge was adopted by a rising vote.

Third: The committee on "Service Flag and Honor Roll" adopted the recommendation of the President to the effect "that each Lodge compile a list of its members who joined the defense forces and inscribe their names, rank, and branch of service upon an 'Honor Roll' to be placed in front of the President's station. Furthermore, that each Lodge secure a service flag representing the number of their members in service". The committee also acknowledged the gift, by the Committee of Fifty, San Francisco, of a District service flag.

Fourth: The special committee on "Social Service" recommended that, "owing to the many urging demands due to present war activities, no appropriation be made for social service, but that the amount required to continue the organized department be left to the discretion of the General Committee".

Fifth: The committee on "Grand Lodge Sessions" approved the recommendation of the President, to the effect that Grand Lodge Sessions be held in different cities throughout the jurisdiction. The same committee also reported the thanks of the Grand Lodge to the brethren of Fresno Lodge No. 723, to the Committee on Arrangements, the Women's Auxiliary, the local press, to Brothers Mendelsohn, Diamond and Coffee, and last, but by no means least, to Mrs. L. M. Mendelsohn and Mrs. L. I. Diamond.

Sixth: The committee on "State of the Order" heartily approved of the several paragraphs in the President's report referred to it, and concluded by saying, "That it highly commends the constructive work of the outgoing President and hopes that he will remain a worker among us in the furtherance of the ideals for which our Order stands."

Seventh: The special committee on "Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare Work" filed a report, which had the closest attention of the Grand Lodge and absorbed its time more than any other subject. It referred to the President's experiences with the Northwestern branch of the Jewish Board of Welfare Work and congratulated the Grand Lodge that the complications and misunderstandings have happily been removed and all differences reconciled. The committee considered "that a great deal of the work of reconciliation had already been done by the conciliatory and tactful efforts put forth by the President as well as by the brethren of Tacoma and Seattle". It therefore recommended the approval of the action of the President "in the various details of the work undertaken by him at Tacoma, and likewise commends the brethren of Tacoma and Seattle for the conscientious manner in which they have served what appeared to be conflicting interests, but which will hereafter, the committee trusts, become co-operating forces".

The committee furthermore recommended "that the proposed agreement about to be executed by and between the B'nai B'rith and the Jewish Board for Welfare Work be approved, ratified, and adopted by this District; and that the B'nai B'rith Club House at Tacoma be under the exclusive management and control of the B'nai B'rith."

The committee likewise recommended "that an assessment of $1.00 per member be levied for the purpose set forth in the President's message as part of the expense of maintenance of the B'nai B'rith Club House at Tacoma." (Though adopted by the Grand Lodge, this assessment is entirely contingent on the result of the vote on the amendment to the Constitution, submitted by the Executive Committee. Should that be carried by the necessary two-thirds vote, the tax will be levied by the Executive Committee instead of by the Grand Lodge).

Subsequently to the adoption of the above report, a motion prevailed to create a Board of Managers, consisting of seven members of the Order in the Northwest, who shall operate under the supervision of the General Committee.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED

Oakland Lodge No. 252 was accorded the thanks of the Grand Lodge for its enterprise in producing a special edition of the Oakland "Tribune" devoted entirely to the Order. Thanks were also wired to the publisher of the paper.

The Grand Lodge expressed its esteem for President Kraus and its deep appreciation of his presence, hoping that "our honorable and worthy President may be spared to the Order in health and contentment, surrounded by his dearly beloved ones, for many years to come".

By resolution the Grand Lodge adopted a form for patriotic exercises at the opening of the Lodge, which in due time, will be printed and distributed among the lodges.

A resolution was adopted, respectfully "urging the incoming Grand President to take immediate steps to bring about the harmonious co-operation with other committees and agencies, engaged in the welfare work for Jewish Soldiers and Sailors".

In response to a hearty invitation, the Grand Lodge decided to hold the fifty-sixth annual session in the city of Los Angeles, where a royal welcome will undoubtedly be extended to the delegates, on the third Sunday in February, 1919.

On Monday afternoon, Mr. Adolf Kraus, President of the Order honored the Convention with his presence and delivered a very instructive and inspiring address. President Kraus also installed the officers of the new administration.

For the first time in the history of the District the Grand Lodge was honored by the presence of the President of the Order. Bro. Adolf Kraus, who happened to winter at Pasadena, responded to a cordial invitation, tendered him by the General Committee, and came to meet his brethren of the Pacific Coast in annual session assembled. The brother was received not only with the honors due his station, but with a manifestation of love and admiration, which the brethren felt belonged to him for his statesmanlike conduct of the affairs of the Order, ever since his first election in 1905.

On Monday evening a reception and ball was given to the delegates and their ladies at the Fresno Civic Auditorium. Governor Stephens made a short address to the assemblage.

TUESDAY SESSION.

Great interest and enthusiasm were displayed at the annual election on Tuesday afternoon and resulted as follows: Grand President, Richard E. Gutstadt; First Grand Vice-President, Milton Meyer; Second Grand Vice-President, L. M. Mendelsohn of Fresno; Grand Secretary, I. J. Ashheim; Grand Treasurer, Joseph L. Goldsmith. The following members form the general committee: Abraham Jonas of San Francisco, P. G. P.; Edmund Tausky of San Francisco, P. G. P.; Otto Irving Wise of San Francisco, P. G. P.; I. M. Golden of San Francisco, P. G. P.; Harry Wolfe, San Francisco, P. G. P.; David N. Mossessohn of Portland, P. G. P., and Lucius L. Solomons of San Francisco, P. G. P., associate members.

On Tuesday evening a sumptuous banquet was tendered the delegates and their ladies at Hotel Fresno. During the day various amendments to the general laws were enacted.

First: The title of "Youths' Auxiliaries" by which the organizations of boys of from 13 to 21 were designated, was changed to "Junior B'nai B'rith".

Second: The Grand Secretary was authorized to provide a "Uniform Membership Card" for the District, which, in the form of a receipt, shall constitute the only official receipt for the payment of dues or other indebtedness to the Lodge. These receipt cards shall be furnished to the Lodges at a cost fixed by the General Committee.

Third: After the first of March, Lodges are prohibited from admitting candidates for membership on the benefit-paying plan. This affects affiliates as well as initiates. Beneficiary members who withdraw from their Lodges cannot be re-admitted as such. Beneficiary members suspended from their Lodges for non-payment may be re-admitted within a year on their original rights upon the payment of a fee. The rights of beneficiary members in good standing at the time of the adoption of this law are in no wise impaired thereby.

From the moment of their arrival to and until their departure from the convention city, the representatives and their ladies had the constant attention of the committees on arrangements, one representing Fresno Lodge, No. 723, and the other, Fresno Auxiliary, No. 13. The evenings were entirely devoted to public functions, and during the day, while the representatives attended to their duties in session, the ladies had their diversions, provided for them by the members of the Auxiliary.

During the banquet the retired president, David N. Mosessohn, was presented with a magnificant silver service in recognition of his faithful and efficient service rendered the district during his administration.

The president of the Order, Mr. Adolf Kraus, was the guest of the Portland delegation at lunch.

A feature of the convention was the elaborate entertainment program given by Fresno Lodge, No. 723, for the visiting delegates and their ladies. This included an automobile ride through Fresno, a banquet, dance and other affairs which left not a dull moment throughout the three-day session.

The committee of Fresno Lodge in charge of this entertainment consisted of Louis M. Mendelsohn, chairman; Harry Coffee; Sidney Kaizer; J. H. Mittenthal; A. L. Pollack; Saul Samuel, and L. I. Diamond.

In advance of the opening of the session, services held on Friday evening and Saturday morning in Fresno were conducted by Rabbi N. Mosessohn of Portland. The sermons were delivered by Rabbi Edgar F. Magnin of Los Angeles on Friday evening, and Rabbi Emanuel Jack of Stockton on Saturday morning.

PALESTINE COMMISSION LEAVES ENGLAND.

It is announced by the Provisional Zionist Committee that several members of the Palestine Commission have left London on March 4 en route to Palestine. Dr. Chaim Weitzman, who is chairman of the commission, and president of the English Zionist Federation, was received in audience by King George. A representative of the British government is accompanying the commission.

AN IMPORTANT GATHERING.

By Oscar Leonard.

The National Conference of Jewish Charities will hold its meeting this year in Kansas City, May 12-15. In some ways it is going to be the most important conference because of the peculiar situation in which we find ourselves. There are a number of problems in Jewish Social Service arising from the present war. Some reconstruction problems will be taken up also.

The Jews of America must prepare to meet situations as they arise. When this war is over, there will be new conditions to face. The Jews in Russia will probably find themselves differently placed than before the war. The situation in Palestine will surely differ from what it was. There will be numerous readjustments.

We have the new situation on the Pacific Coast. Jewish people have begun to come that way in the past two years. That developes a new condition there. The Jewish communities immediately interested will be in search of guidance as to the handling of the immigrants.

Jewish social workers have been doing imporant work in connection with the war situation. Mr. Billikopf, for instance, has left his work in Kansas City to give himself over entirely to the raising of funds for the relieve of the suffering Jews in the war ridden countries. He has accomplished a stupendous task. Dr. Boris Bogen, Field Secretary of the National Conference of Jewish Charities, together with Mr. Max Senior of Cincinnati, spent several months in Holland organizing the relief work coming from these shores. Mr. Morris Waldman, head of the Federation of Jewish Charities in Boston, has been called to Washington to help in the directing of Red Cross work.

All over the country Jewish Social Workers have responded readily to every call for help from the Government, the Red Cross and other agencies. They are working on case committees for the relief of families of men in the United States army and navy. They are serving in many capacities.

These new experiences, undoubtedly are valuable, to the workers as well as to the work they undertake. The sessions of the Kansas City Conference will be interesting since these experiences will be discussed.

Efforts will be made to discuss the problems of smaller communities, particularly the inter-mountain question, as related to Jewish needs. There will be reports of work done and of possible work to be undertaken in various parts of the country.

There will be opportunities for discussing specialized problems. The program is now being worked out. Leading social workers will participate.

Jewish communities wide awake to the present social problems will send their representatives. No community alive to the situation can afford to stay away from this important conference. Jewish social service organizations should by all means send professional workers to the Conference. Directors of such organizations should attend too, in order to familiarize themselves with the big job, in which they have an integral part.

The officers of the National Conference for Jewish Charities are: Aaron Cohen, Pittsburgh, President; Fred M. Butzel, Detroit, First Vice-President; Jules K. Hexter, Dallas, Second Vice-President; Jacob Billikopf, Kansas City, Third Vice-President; Bernard Greensfelder, St. Louis, Treasurer; Louis H. Levin, Baltimore, Secretary.

HEBREW UNIVERSITY IN PALESTINE.

One of the functions of the Palestine Commission will be to establish a Hebrew university in Jerusalem. The British members of the commission, who have already departed for Palestine will put the project into operation as soon as they arrive. The finest site near Jerusalem on the Mount of Olives, has been secured for that purpose.

In connection with the Hebrew University, the British Palestine Committee has issued the following statement:

"Other peoples are discussing by what arms they will be equipped in the world after the war. The symbol of the new Jewish Palestine is a noble house of learning, a sanctuary of the Jewish passion for spiritual values, for intellectual truths, a center from which once again the law shall go out from Sinai and the Word of God from Jerusalem. There can be no more illuminating way of teaching the world that a Jewish Palestine will be no seat of chauvinism, and no house of Mammon, but a hearth of that civilization which spells peace and humanity."

Thoughts and Tidings—Review of Passing Events

By H. Eliassof

Solomon Jacob Abramowitsch.

During the last month, the Jewish press in general and particularly the Yiddish papers, contained articles in which the death of Solomon Jacob Abramowitsch, the great Yiddish writer of the last half of the nineteenth century, who died at Odessa on the fifteenth of last December, at the high age of 82 years, was loudly lamented. They all paid a high tribute to his talent and placed the crown of immortality upon his genius. Mourning services and memorial meetings were also held during that time in many synagogues and secular societies, where thousands had gathered to venerate the memory of this beloved author, and eloquent speakers eulogized his name in glowing words of praise.

When thousands unite in mourning the loss of a beloved writer, he certainly must have been a man of real merit. His thoughts and teachings must have touched the hearts of his readers, and his words of wisdom must have made a lasting impression upon their souls. The achievements of such a writer, even if he worked in the remote field of a humble dialect literature, deserve to be known in wider circles. Besides we must not forget that Yiddish, the language in which Abramowitsch wrote so successfully, is still spoken by millions of our brethren in the wide diaspora. On this account alone the life and service of a prominent Yiddish writer must touch some hidden heartstring in the Jewish breast and must arouse some interest even among Jews, who are far removed from the Yiddish dialect and its literature.

I will therefore endeavor to acquaint the readers of the "News" with the position which Solomon Jacob Abramowitsch occupied in the modern Yiddish literature and the significance and practical value of his words for the Yiddish reading masses. For this purpose I will in the main follow the latest and most comprehensive work, "Yiddish Literature in the Nineteenth Century," published in New York, in 1899, by Professor Leo Wiener, who has made a thorough study of this subject.

Solomon Jacob Abramowitsch, or Mendele Mocher Sforim (Mendele the Bookseller), a nom de plume by which he was better known, was born in 1835, in the town of Kopyl, in the Government of Minsk, Russia. Like most of the Jewish boys of his time he received his Jewish instruction in a Heder (Elementary Hebrew school), and later in a Yeshibah (Talmudic academy). At the age of seventeen, his knowledge of Hebrew was so thorough that he was able to compose verses in that language. He lost his father early, and his mother married a second time. When he was eighteen years old, he was persuaded by a swindler, who was nothing else but an itinerary beggar, to accompany him on a journey to Volhynia. Abramowitsch traveled with him for several months from town to town, until they at last came to the city of Kremenets. Here he found friends and leaving his traveling companion, he settled there and became a Hebrew teacher to the children of the wealthier inhabitants. Here he made his first attempts to become a Hebrew author. He wrote a Hebrew essay on education, which was printed in the Hebrew weekly "Hamagid", and which attracted much attention at the time. He then wrote several Hebrew stories; he also published a natural history, which he translated from the German. But neither one of his Hebrew works met with success and he decided to write in Yiddish. "I am studying the life of my people", he said, intending to depict it in stories, written in the tongue of the Bible, but the majority of Jews do not know that tongue and are familiar only with Yiddish. Of what avail are the ideas and works of a writer if they are of no use to his people?" And as a Yiddish writer, his genius rose to be a star of the first magnitude. He enriched the vocabulary of that poverty stricken dialect, he introduced a new graceful and vivid style into the feeble and inanimate diction of the old jargon and re-created and transformed it into a new vigorous tongue. He loved his people with all his heart, and he therefore was able to understand the sufferings of the Jewish masses. His heart bled with the wounds which a cruel government inflicted daily upon his people, he sympathized with the lowliest, among them in their unutterable woes, in their degrading humilations, in their dense darkness and their helpless ignorance, in their groping blindness, their grinding poverty, and their pitiful dependence. He saw how they were misled, oppressed and despoiled by their own corrupt and selfish leaders and he openly reproved, condemned and held up to scorn the false idealists, the busy bodies, the blood suckers and the hypocrites among the Kahals of the Jewish communities. The down trodden masses of his people loved him and therefore they too understand him and were grateful to him for his works which helped to save and redeem them. He consecrated his life, his mind, his talents and his genius to their interests and they rewarded him with admiration, loyalty and homage.

The subject of his first work, "The Little Man", is an autobiography of a man, who, by low flattery, vile servility, and all dishonest ways, rises to high places of emolument, which he uses entirely in order to enrich himself at the expense of the people. Such men had been the bane of Jewish communities in Russia in the middle of the last century.

The greatest curse of the Jewish community in Russia, had ever been the meat and candle tax, which all had to pay, nominally to support communal institutions, but the greater part of which went into the pockets of the representatives of the Kahal, to whom the tax was farmed out. No meat and no candle could be purchased without that arbitrary imposition by the members of the Kahal, who in their fiendish craving for money, increased the original cost of meat several fold, and who spared no means, however criminal, to silence any opposition to their doings. It is these men that Abramowitsch had the courage to hold up to the scorn of the people in his second work, "The Meat Tax", or the "Gang of City Benefactors". This work was translated into Russian by Petrikovski, it attracted the attention of the government, which tried to remedy the evil. Abramowitsch had to flee for his life but the book did its work. It became the possession of the people, and many of its salient sentences have become everyday proverbs.

In the same year (1863), there appeared his story from the life of the Jewish mendicants, "Fishke the Lame". It is a love story from the world of the lame and the halt that constituted the profession of mendicants, or as we call them "schnorrers", of every Russian town in the West. We are introduced there to a class of people with entirely different motives, different aims in life, from those we are accustomed to see about us. They hide from daylight and have a morality of their own; but yet they are possessed of the passions that we find in beings endowed with all the senses and enjoying the advantages of well-organized society. One must have lived among them, been one of them, so to reproduce their language, their thoughts, as Abramowitsch has done in this novel.

His next work, "The Dobbin", is the most perfect of his productions. It unites into one a psychological study of a demented man, with a delicate allegory, in which the history of his people in Russia is delineated. It combines a biting satire with a tragic story; it is a prophecy and a history in one. If the "Meat Tax" had made him the favorite of the masses, who suffered from the oppression of the members of the Kahal, "The Dobbin" was calculated to endear him with all who professed the Jewish faith. In "The Dobbin", Abramowitsch foresaw the great calamities which were to befall his people in Russia some years later and that soon they would need only words of consolation. "The Dobbin" is the personification of the Jewish race. The book was very popular, and although there was a demand for new editions, the Russian government would not permit them, as even this veiled allegory appeared to it as too open an accusation of its acts. Only sixteen years later the censor relaxed and allowed a second edition to appear.

In 1879, Abramowitsch published a volume entitled, "The Wanderings of Benjamin the Third", which was translated into Polish by Klemens Junosza. The translator called it, "The Jewish Don Quixote", and this brought to Abramowitsch the appellation of "The Jewish Cervantes". The work is a carricature. It tells the tsory of a Quixotic fellow who starts out to discover the mystic river Sambation and the tribe of the Red Jews, but who never gets any further than the town of Berdichev and its dirty river Guilopiat.

These are his main works. He has written a number of others which are of minor importance, but all his works have been widely circulated and enjoyed great popularity. His admirers named him the "Grandfather" of the Yiddish literature and his name and memory will live for many many generations, for like the immortal writers of the ancient classics and the proud modern nations of the world, he was an expounder of the real life of his people and a benefactor of humanity by the benign influence of his teachings.

Ambassador Reading.

The sending by Great Britain of Earl Isaac Rufus Reading, Lord Chief Justice, as Ambassador to the United States is significant in many respects. It proves in the first place that the English Jews need not consider the anti-Semitic manifestations, which have lately become rather disquieting in the United Kingdom, any too seriously. As long as the British government shows no anti-Semitic proclivities, the Jews of England are safe. A strong and liberal government like the British can and will always maintain order in its realm and afford protection to all its citizens against maddened mobs, against an incendiary press and against all kinds of frenzied agitators of lawless excesses. As long as the British government remains as it is, anti-Semitism can never gain a firm foothold in England and develope into the ferocity which it had reached in Russia, in Roumania or even in Germany. The trouble in those countries has always been that their ruling classes are narrow minded and illiberal. This is not the case in England. The English declaration for an independent Jewish state in Palestine and the appointment of a Jew to the post of High Commissioner and Minister Plenipotentiary in the United States are ample proof of this gratifying fact.

The coming of such a brilliant Jew to the United States to represent diplomatically such a great power as England can also not fail to have a beneficial effect upon the social and political standing of the American Jews. We have had a Jew in the Cabinet, a Jew is also at present occupying a place on the Supreme Bench in this country and now the mighty United Kingdom, one of the great powers of Europe, is showing us that the Jew has the ability and is deserving of the confidence to be trusted with a position of the highest political and diplomatic importance. These facts must even teach the editors of an anti-Semitic paper like the notorious "Life", a wholesome lesson.

Some have compared Lord Reading to Disraeli, of whom the Jews of the world are so proud. But the Jews can take a greater pride in Earl Reading than they do in the Earl of Beaconsfield, for Earl Reading is loyal to Judaism and his distinction therefore reflects more direct honor upon the Jewish people.

I will close with a short biographical sketch of Lord Reading. It will surely prove of great interest to the readers of the "News":

Lord Reading, or Rufus Daniel Isaacs, as he was formerly called, is the second son of the late Joseph M. Isaacs, a merchant in the city of London. Rufus Isaacs was born in 1860, and is consequently 58 years old. As a boy he ran away to sea and on his return to England, after a voyage around the world, having had more than enough of the sea, he went to manage the family business in Magdeburg, Germany. This, however, pleased him no better, and, two years later, he was again in London and embarked on a career on the stock exchange. Meeting with even less success here, he determined to become a lawyer and in this profession he quickly became famous as a great financial lawyer.

He later commenced to take interest in politics and his rise as a politician was phenonmenal. In 1904, he entered Parliament in the liberal interest as a member for Reading and continued to represent that constituency in the House of Commons until 1913, when he was appointed Lord Chief Justice of England. He was Solicitor-General from 1910 to 1913, being given a seat in the Cabinet in 1912. In 1914, he was created a Viscount.

Lord Reading was raised to the peerage as Baron Reading in 1914, and his great services in connection with the various financial arrangements between the United Kingdom and the United States were recognized with an earldom. He was one of the leading members of the Anglo-French financial commission, which visited the United States in 1915. His last visit to the United States was in September and October of 1917. He presided at the Anglo-American war conference in London last November

CONVENTION OF I. O. B. B.

The Convention of District No. 4 Independent Order B'nai B'rith, recently held in Fresno, Cal., proved once more the excellent work done by the Order. The enthusiasm and fervor displayed by all delegates in matters concerning the weal of our people rose to its heights, the zeal of every delegate for any good act in favor of our boys in the navy and army reached its apogee. The patriotic addresses by brilliant orators was an inspiration to all present and the unity of all shades of Israel into one compact, indivisible unit proved the usefulness of the Order.

Howsoever synagog and temple serve Judaism well, yet instead of uniting, it separates Israel. Howsoever the benediction v'yosem lcho sholom—and may He give thee peace—be repeated in the houses of worship, the mere fact that temple and shul are built for radical reform reform, conservative, catholic Israel and simon-pure orthodox worshippers, proves that the prayers of the priests in the one, and of the rabbis in the other houses of prayer instead of singing peace and harmony in Israel divides him into as many divisions as there are interpretations of Judaism.

Each synagog and temple stands upon its own definition of Judaism, hence does not unite Israel upon his common religious agreements, but separates him according to their detailed religious disagreements. Not so the Independent Order B'nai B'rith, its purpose is to unite Israel upon his common religious agreements, leaving the disagreements to the synagog's and temple's religious zeals. This union of all links of Israel into one strong indestructible chain we noted at this convention, and we pray that this great and sublime achievement be not destroyed by windy mischief makers, who try to inject religious strife into the Order.—Portland Jewish Tribune.

COMMISSION FOR PALESTINE

Well-known Zionists Named to Plan New Jewish State.

The Provisional Zionist Committee announced yesterday the appointment of two of the American members of the international commission which will soon meet in Palestine to plan the establishment of the new Jewish state and arrange for the rebuilding of the Jewish colonies destroyed in the war. The two commissioners are Dr. Harry Friedenwald of Baltimore and Mr. E. W. Lewin-Epstein of New York. The names of three more American members of the commission will be announced shortly, and the commission will leave for Palestine in the next fortnight. The sum of $400,000 has been appropriated from the Palestine Restoration Fund for the work of the commission in Palestine.

British and Russian members of the commission have already been appointed.

Both American appointees have long been prominent in the Zionist organization. Dr. Friedenwald was formerly president of the Maryland State Medical Association. He is one of the leading eye specialists of the United States and for a long time has been connected with the City College Hospital of Baltimore. He has been elected president of the Federation of American Zionists for thirteen consecutive years. He has been in Palestine and knows the country thoroughly.

Mr. Lewin-Epstein was one of the inaugurators of the Zionist movement back in 1882. He was a founder of the Jewish colony of Rehobot in Palestine in 1890, and administered its affairs for ten years. He was treasurer and director of the first Hebrew school established in Palestine in 1891. In 1895, he organized the first co-operative company for the sale in Russia of the products of the Jewish Palestinian colonies. Now the products of the colonies are marketed by these companies in every country in the world. Since 1900 he has been in this country and he has been treasurer of the Provisional Zionist Committee since its formation in 1904, and treasurer of the Palestine Fund. He is a member of the executive committees of the three Jewish Relief Committees here. He was appointed by President Wilson a member of a committee with Henry Morganthau and Dr. Felix Frankfurter to visit Egypt last summer on behalf of Palestinian affairs.

ARMAGEDDON

By Dr. Max L. Margolis

Written for the B'nai B'rith News

It is nearly six years ago that the rival of the present incumbent in the highest office within the gift of the nation in a convention speech applied to an internal political situation the name Armageddon, thus familiarizing a larger public with an expression and a concept hitherto known to theologians only. Then came the great war, and the name and thing were once more before us, this time in a truer application. The word occurs in the New Testament, in the Book of Revelation, chapter 16, verse 16. Not only is the name there expressly signalized as Hebrew, but, as the sequel will bring out, the thing is singularly Jewish, whereof the record is found in our Scriptures and then in our post-biblical literature. It is unnecessary to point out the nature of the passage in which the word occurs, which would pre-suppose an analysis of the contents of the closing book of the New Testament, the time when it was composed, and the purpose which the author had in mind. One statement will suffice: Armageddon is the place of the last battle-field where the kings of the whole world are gathered together unto the war of the great day of God. "The Mountain of Megiddo"—for such is the apparent meaning of the name—has offered a puzzle to students. In the first place mountains are not normally the chosen scenes of battles, and secondly our Scriptures make mention of the Plain of Megiddo, which is none other than the Great Plain of Esdraelon, the Vale of Jezrael, girt by hills on all sides, laid open or gaping in the midst of the main range of Palestine. In Taanach by the waters of Megiddo the kings of Canaan came, they fought; there were they met by Israel's consecrated warriors, with flowing locks, jeopardizing their lives unto the death, as they came to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord among the mighty; for they fought from heaven, the stars in their courses fought against Sisera; until the ancient brook Kishon swept the enemy away, as the princes of Israel rushed forth into the valley, led by Deborah, a mother in Israel, and the valiant Barak. Off to the east of that ancient battle-field Gideon encountered the Midianite hordes and in a night march overwhelmed the Arab raiders and threw them into a panic. A little further south, on the slopes of Mount Gilbea, Israel's first king, Saul, together with his three sons, met his death in a desperate encounter with the Philistines, who had entered the Vale by Megiddo and made ready to subjugate the low country that Israel might be driven to the mills. At Megiddo, one of the last kings of Judah, Josiah, rashly ventured opposition to the Pharoah as he advanced from the south to take a hand in the disposition of the defunct Assyrian empire, only to be balked by the young Babylonian prince, Nebuchadnezzar, at the crossing of the Euphrates; Josiah was mortally wounded, and the dirge upon his death was made by Jeremiah. In the succeeding centuries, Syrians, Egyptians, and Jews in Maccabean times marched and counter-marched in the Great Plain; there you might see the elephants and engines of Antiochus, the litters of Cleopatra and her ladies. The Romans came and planted their camps and stamped their mighty names to this day on the soil; Pompey, Mark Antony, Vespasian, and Titus passed at the head of their legions, and the men of Galilee sallied forth upon them from the same nooks in the hills from which their forefathers broke upon the chariots of Canaan. Still later, the Greek hosts were routed by the Arabs in the Vale of Jezrael. The Crusaders appeared, and once more the Arabs routed them, and Saladin spread his camp where Israel saw those of Midian and the Philistines. In 1799 Napoleon broke into the Plain by Megiddo, and by the same route he retreated. And here, it may safely be predicted, Allenby and Falkenhayn bid fair to meet in a deadly grasp. It is a historic battle-ground, famed in the annals of the land; it is quite natural that the seer placed there what to him seemed to be the last battle, the last stand of imperial Rome in the great day of God.

The great day of God! It is the great and terrible day of the Lord, which gives the Sabbath preceding Passover its appellation, the Great Sabbath. The day of the Lord is the day of His manifestation, the day upon which He exercises His functions as Judge of the world, the Day of Judgment. Now the divine manifestation may be for ill or for good, nay, must be for both. "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do justly?" Judgment must be grounded in justice, and justice demands the recognition of merit as well as the punishment of evil. Like a coin, the Day has its obverse and reverse. It means death and desolation, but it also stands for life and reconstruction. According as the nation or mankind is steeped in overweening arrogance or is lost in despair, either side of the picture may be turned to the view. It is a one-sided error to maintain that our prophets were essentially seers of evil. They offer consolation as well. But theirs is not an easy-going optimism. Their lofty idealism makes them impatient with half-measures. They clamor for a radical change of heart, and ere the heart of stone may be turned into one of flesh, man must pass through the crucible of suffering. They all issue the call to repentance, even if it come at the eleventh hour. All great teachers of religion are imbued with the seriousness of life, the great responsibility before the Lord, who is the pattern of righteousness. Mohammed paints in lurid colors the Day of Judgment. Jesus proclaims the nearness of the Kingdom of God. The prophets, amidst the ease and luxury and a civilization grounded in oppression, announce that the Day of the Lord is at hand. It is a day of gloom, a day of wrath, of troubles and distress, of wasteness and desolation, a day upon all that is proud and lofty, when all that is lifted up shall be brought low: the cedars of Lebanon, and the oaks of Bashan, the high mountains, the lofty tower, the fortified wall, the ships of Tarshish—had Isiah lived in our own days, he would have included in the catalogue the sky-scraper and the super-dreadnaught and the aeroplane—that the loftiness of man may be bowed down, and the haughtiness of man be brought low, and the Lord alone be exalted in that day. The Day of Judgment is universal in its character, striking down the wicked everywhere. As stern preachers of the strictest justice, the prophets spare not their own people. Amos by no means destroys the conception that Israel is the elect of God. He grants it. Only he deepens it. Noblesse oblige. Because Israel is God's chosen one, he must be righteous above all others. Hence his summons: Seek ye the Lord, and live. The emphasis is upon the second element as well as upon the first. No prophet in Israel would have acquiesced in the utter death of the nation. It may pass through the hell of exile, that it may rise to a new and purer and better and happier life. But for the moment the tone of chiding predominates, as it ought to in all earnest preachers. If needs be, the Lord is prepared to summon against His own people a nation from afar off, to humble it, to tread it down. When catastrophe upon catastrophe strikes the people and yet their ears remain dull and their eyes blind and their minds obtuse, then come the worst. "He will lift up an ensign to the nations from far, and will hiss unto them from the end of the earth; and, behold, they shall come with speed swiftly; none shall be weary nor stumble among them; none shall slumber nor sleep; neither shall the girdle of their loins be loosed, nor the latchet of their shoes be broken; whose arrows are sharp, and all their bows bent; their horses' hoofs shall be counted as flint, and their wheels like a whirlwind; their roaring shall be like a lion, they shall roar like young lions, yea, they shall roar, and lay hold of the prey, and carry it away safe, and there shall be none to deliver; and they shall roar against them in that day like the roaring of the sea; and if one look unto the land, behold darkness and distress, and the light is darkened and the skies thereof" the picture of complete preparedness and fitness for destruction, which suggested itself to the onlooker as he beheld the interminable march of German soldiery through the streets of Brussels, was of course, borrowed by Isiah from the motley hordes of the Assyrian invader; but then again the prophetic genius is creative and the portrayal is one which will fit all times.

Convinced as the prophets were that Israel must be humbled if needs be, through the overrunning of Judah by the mighty waters of the Euphrates, they forgot not that the Assyrian was but an instrument in the hands of the Deity, the red of His anger, sent against an ungodly nation. But when the thought comes to them that the conqueror, far from conceiving himself an instrument in the hands of God, boasts of his own strength and wisdom, in that he removed the bounds of the peoples, and has robbed their treasures, and has brought down as a veritable God the inhabitants, then the prophetic indignation turns against the destroyer of nations, and at the moment of his highest success, the downfall of the lofty one is predicted, exactly as Sennacherib was halted when he shook his hands at the mount of the daughter of Zion, the hill of Jerusalem. And so in the prophetic discourses, the oldest and the youngest, the destruction of Jacob is made a prelude to the destruction of the many nations gathered against Israel. "Make ye uproar, O ye peoples, and ye shall be broken in pieces; and give ear, all ye of far countries! Gird yourselves, and ye shall be broken in pieces! Take counsel together, and it shall be brought to nought; speak the word and it shall not stand!" "Ah, the uproar of many peoples, that roar like the roaring of the seas, and the rushing of nations, that rush like the rushing of mighty waters! But He shall rebuke them, and they shall flee far off, and shall be chased as the chaff of the mountains before the wind, and like the whirling dust before the storm. At eventide behold terror; and before the morning they are not. This is the portion of them that spoil us, and the lot of them that rob us." In the prophetic programs, Israel must pass through the agony of the exile; it is what the rabbis call "the throes of the Messiah." Aye, even when rescued from the exile and brought back to Jerusalem, the nation shall be subjected to one more final assault. Many nations will gather about Jerusalem, that the Holy City may be defiled. "But they know not the thoughts of the Lord, neither understand they His counsel." Before the gates of Jerusalem they shall be routed. In the valley of Jehosophat, that is, God, judgeth, God will enter into judgment with the nations. Against the sons of Javan the sons of Zion shall be stirred up. "And the Lord shall be seen over them, and His arrow shall go forth as the lightning; the Lord of hosts will defend them." The prophet Ezekiel designates the assailants as the hosts of Gog (Magog). The Second Psalm deals with this episode. "Why are the nations in an uproar, and why do the peoples mutter in vain? The kings of the earth stand up, and the rulers take counsel together, against the Lord, and against His anointed." The rabbis make frequent allusion to the final onslaught of the world against Israel, and in our liturgy the passing away from the earth of the arrogant kingdom with all its wickedness ushers in the everlasting Kingdom of God. Daniel's vision of the four world empires, likened to beasts, which must do their worst before the kingdom of the saints can be established, was epoch-making. In the sequel, the fourth empire was identified with the Roman, which are not only to the Jews but also to the early Christians represented the figure of the enemy of God and God's kingdom. "Then, thus reads one of our prayers, then, when the hope of Israel is fulfilled, may the righteous see and be glad, and the upright exalt, and the pious joy with singing; iniquity will shut its mouth, and all wickedness vanish like smoke; for Thou wilt cause the arrogant kingdom to pass away from the earth; and rule Thou, O Lord by Thyself, over all Thy creatures, on the mountain of Zion, Thy glorious dwelling and in Jerusalem, Thy Holy City, as it is written in Thy holy words. The Lord shall reign forever, Thy God, O Zion, unto all generations."

No reader of our Scriptures can escape the impression that our prophets, no less than our law-givers and psalmists, were imbued with the definite idea that God, who is the world's Creator, has a purpose with the world, that that purpose means the victory of good over evil, and that the agency chosen by Him to carry out the divine purpose is His elect people, Israel. There may be some among the prophets whose chiding is more pronounced; sometimes it is a matter of temperament, as with the stern shepherd-prophet Amos, or Jeremiah who knew himself a man of strife with the whole world; others had tenderer souls, like Hosea who put love, affection, above justice, who knew that a chastened affection had in it the potencies of disciples far superior to those of the red; but all concluded with the outlook into the better times, into the future order, when Israel, refined through suffering, would turn, repent, become the bearer of the ideal implanted in him by the Ruler of nations. Listen not to the latter-day notions according to which the prophets were the enemies of their people. Repeat not the wisdom of our detracters that the world was foolish to take the Jew at his own valuation. Let us not have Jewish anti-Semites. We must boldly reiterate the belief that we are God's elect and cling to the faith which runs through our sacred Scriptures from cover to cover. Remember that the world purpose which God has committed to our keeping is charged with blessing for the whole world. Our enemies say we wish to rule over the world. The lie has been refuted by our best teachers. Our literature is replete with the idea, clearly enunciated, that the word which is to go forth from Zion restored is the cessation of warfare, the true pacifism, and that the Kingdom of God means a humanity united as one band to do God's will with a perfect heart. The hope in the advent of the Kingdom of God is rooted in Jewish monotheism. "He is our God, and there is no other. Therefore, do we hope O Lord, our God, speedily to behold Thy majestic power, when Thou wilt set the world aright through the Kingdom of God, and all mankind will invoke Thy name."

We are living in times pregnant with great results. This war is upon us. Its meaning is coming home to every American home. It is borne in upon us through privations and sacrifices of life and labor. It is futile to lay the blame for it at this or that door. Religion teaches the supreme duty of patriotism. But church and synagogue must not be swamped. The voice of the pulpit must rise above the selfish and ignoble. We must not in unctuous self-righteousness lay claim to all the virtues for ourselves and charge the other side with all the vices. War is a calamity. War is a punishment for our sins. But it behooves us to recognize that the war is an instrument in God's hands and that great purposes are meant to be accomplished through it. None of us, no nation in the earth, will emerge quite the same after it is all over. We are making history by leaps and bounds. The statesmen keep revising the war-aims in the light of the happenings of every day. Old systems are crumbling to pieces. A new order is coming to light. We of the household of Israel cannot abide by antiquated doctrines, and be they a century old. The Napoleonic era brought us emancipation, the emancipation of the individual Jew. Certain teachers among us then believed that the fulfillment of prophetic ideals had come to pass. They threw the age-long hope of Israel overboard. They taught the people to adjust themselves to a definitive dispersion. The Messianic times were at hand. The personal Messiah was dispensed with. As if an inert world could be regenerated by impersonal agencies. Personality counts for more than abstract ideas. And if mankind is to be reformed to a new aspect of religion, it cannot be done except through a great religious teacher, who is still to come, and who will be the son of a Jewish mother. Every Jewish mother is potentially the mother of that wonder-child. To that end our racial integrity must be kept intact, and from that point of view every weakening of the racial tie is a crime against the best interests of humanity. Look around and behold the wondrous doings of our Lord. He it is who made desolations in the earth; but He also will make wars to cease unto the ends of the earth; He breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spur in sunder; He burneth the chariots in the fire. "Therefore we will not fear, though the earth do change, and though the mountains be moved into the heart of the seas; though the waters thereof roar and foam, though the mountains shake at the swelling thereof." The outcome of the war, so far as Israel is concerned, bids fair to be the restoration of a portion of the Jewish people on the hills and plains of Palestine. The majority will remain scattered as before, yet held together by the common love for the mother country. And that means the beginning of the redemption of Israel and through Israel of the world. The lighter things are coming to pass. The gathering of the dispersed, the rebuilding of the waste places. Shall not also the weightier promises be fulfilled, that Israel, restored, with a soil under his feet, shall come into his own, with his soul freed from an intolerable bondage, with his spiritual energies revived? It is perchance too bold to expect this war to be the last. Yet the visions of Israel's prophets, of Micah and Isaiah, inspire the statesmen who visualize a league of nations, with the sea free, and armaments reduced, that the works of peace may be developed. Yet the signs of the times bid us take courage. Let us be men of faith. Let us lay hold of the Scriptures and their momentous message. The nations are locked in a deadly struggle. Perhaps it is Armageddon, the last stand of greed and selfish lust for land and trade against God and goodness. The great day of the Lord is upon us. Its dark side we have all seen, its sufferings we have all experienced. We are not despairing. For despair means the disavowal of faith in God, in God's pur-

NEWS FROM LONDON

By Our Correspondent Dr. M. Epstein

London, Feb. 17, 1918.

On Monday, Feb. 4, 1918, the East End of London witnessed a sight which was not only historic in the true sense of the word, but also cheering and satisfactory. Four companies of the Jewish regiment, 426 strong, marched with full equipment through the streets of the city, from the Tower to Mile End Road, headed by their commander, Colonel J. H. Patterson, who is not merely popular but beloved among all the men. As the procession passed the Mansion House the Lord Mayor of London, who was accompanied by the Lady Mayoress and the Sheriffs, took the salute from the balcony. Further east, at the Pavilion Theater, a number of distinguished members of the community, together with General Sir Francis Lloyd, the general officer commanding the London area, and the Mayor of Stepney greeted the officers and men. Sir Francis Lloyd said that he saw a battalion that would do great credit to itself and to the country. It was by no means the first effort that the great Jewish population of Great Britain had made in the patriotic defense of this country, but they had concentrated on it a special effort which would long be remembered. He wished the men God-speed and the fortunes of battle, and expressed the hope that honors might be showered on them.

Indeed, all opinion agrees that the men presented a fine appearance. Sturdy in physique and martial in their bearing, these four hundred Jewish soldiers formed a unit specifically Jewish, the first probably since the time of Bar Kochba in the second century, and this fact was not perhaps absent from the minds of the dense crowds of Jews who lined the route of the march. War is an evil thing, but if the disturbers of the world's peace, brutish in their nature, can be moved by brute force alone, the world has no alternative but to resort to war, to war which, as the world hopes with President Wilson, will end war How much in advance of their own time—how much in advance of ours—were those ancient Jewish prophets who envisaged the disappearance of war! "There shall not be war any more"—for that the world hopes; for that, no doubt, many also in Germany hope who have recovered from their war madness. But until the principle is established the war, we suppose, must go on. We do not say this easily. We realize to the full what the statement implies. But we seem to be in the grip of a destiny which leaves no other alternative. Be that as it may, our point is that so long as the war goes on and so long as Jews have to participate in it, it seems desirable that they should be congregated in Jewish units. In other words, while the war and militarism are evils, the formation of Jewish units takes some of the slight sting off the evil. From the point of view of the particular Jewish unit of which we are writing, there is another consideration. It is no secret that they are to be sent to Palestine; and this fact has engendered enthusiasm among the men themselves.

Their march was followed by a luncheon which was served by a number of ladies, and it is pleasing to record that a good sprinkling of them are connected with the London Lodge. The meal was pronounced an unqualified success, and the greeting which Mr. Joseph Cowan, the chairman, gave the men went straight to their hearts. "I wish you Mazzal," he told them, and the Chief Rabbi, who with Mrs. Hertz has taken a deep interest in the Jewish unit, concluded the ceremony with a short and appropriate discourse. A fitting recognition of excellent work done in connection with this unit was the granting of a commission to Mr. A. Jabotinsky, who has been restless in his efforts to make the movement a great success.

Little of moment has happened in the ordinary course of communal history in Anglo-Jewry during the last month. The United Synagogue has elected a new president. As a rule the president of this body is the recognized lay head of the community in England, and the choice of the holder of this office is of some importance. The Council of the United Synagogue has nominated, and the body of members has elected, Major Lionel de Rothschild M. P. in the room of his father, and the community as a whole will welcome the appointment. So long has the connection between the United Synagogue and the Rothschilds been established that tradition has almost given the family an hereditary right to the office of president. At present the members of the house have divided certain fields of activity. The Hon. Charles Rothschild, the senior member of the family is wrapped up in the business, being the head of the firm. He has little time for active communal work. His elder brother, the present Lord Rothschild, has been attracted to the national movement and is regarded as one of the leaders of the Zionist movement in England. The cousin of both, Major Lionel de Rothschild, has always shown a keen interest in Jewish and general affairs, and it is only fitting that he should occupy the position of president of the United Synagogue.

There is only one flaw in the appropriateness. Major de Rothschild is also President of the League of British Jews, an organization which, as some one has said, has no principles but only passions, and these not of the noblest. At any rate, it is a separatist body, and it seems hardly fitting that the president of the United Synagogue who is expected to stand forth as the lay representative of Anglo-Jewry should at the same time be head of a hole-and-corner organization, even if its program were otherwise admirable (which is far from being the case in the present instance). Possibly Major de Rothschild will utilize the occasion of his election to the presidency of the United Synagogue as a suitable moment for retiring from a position which may not perhaps be altogether comfortable. The best opinion in the community hopes so, more especially as certain of the leaders of the League have shown signs of having come to realize that their movement was a mistake. Good sense and restrainted statesmanship have triumphed once more, and it is credibly reported that some of the prominent founders of the League are in negotiastions with the Zionists. More need not be added at present.

Major de Rothschild is a young man, and therefore more in harmony with the spirit and needs of the time than were some of the "Grand Dukes" who presided over us in days gone by. His colleague at the United Synagogue is also a young man. Mr. Robert Waley Cohen, a short account of whose lamented mother appeared on this page last month. With so distinguished a father and so pre-eminent a mother, with a family tradition of the very best. Mr. Cohen should make an ideal Vice-President of the United Synagogue. Already at the first meeting at which they were present in an official capacity, both the President and Vice-President won golden opinions for their reasonableness. Major de Rothschild's pleasant smile was agreeably commented upon, and that is a good beginning.

It is a pity that so satisfactory an appointment as Mr. Robert Waley Cohen's should have resulted in some unpleasantness. One of the best-managed committees of the United Synagogue is the Burial Committee, and the chairman of this body for the last twenty years or so has been Mr. Leonard Franklin. Mr. Franklin has achieved great things with his committee, and being one of the senior members of the United Synagogue, expected, it must be confessed with some justice, that when a vacancy in the higher offices of the United Synagogue should occur, his turn would doubtless come for appointment. The office of vice-president had recently become vacant, and instead of Mr. Franklin, Mr. Waley Cohen was chosen. It is a familiar story—the new generation versus the old. Mr. Cohen is eminently suited for the position; his appointment builds for the future. But Mr. Franklin has deserved the appointment, though he looks to the past. In his disappointment Mr. Franklin has resigned all his offices. It must be confessed that much sympathy was expressed both at the United Synagogue and in the community with Mr. Franklin. The question is, was it so utterly impossible to retain Mr. Franklin and introduce Mr. Cohen, too? No problem, in political affairs, whether national or communal, is without its proper solution, and that this misunderstanding was allowed to arise is proof positive of the poor capacity of the men who at present are running the United Synagogue and the community. It is to be hoped that the new officers will not only be more in harmony with the times and the requirements of the community, but will also possess that power of handling men which is one of the prime qualifications for leadership.

The Zionist movement is gaining in popularity and also making headway along practical lines. The British government has sanctioned the appointment of a commission to proceed to Palestine in order to assist in relief work on the spot and to take stock of the general situation. It is obviously difficult to describe accurately all that the commission is to do, but it is sufficient that such a commission is going out. From England there are going Dr. Weitzmann, Mr. Leon Simon, Mr. Cowan and Dr Eder, and they will be joined by three delegates from Russia. The more the British line in Palestine is extended, the greater the area for the commission to traverse. Meanwhile politicians in Germany are rather sorry they did not do what the British government did—give a welcome to the Jewish national movement, and some of the saner men are advising support of the idea even now. Harden, for instance, urges the German government to give the movement their blessing, but it is hardly likely that the German junkers will do anything of the sort. In the first place, they are not likely to take advice from Harden; in the second, they care little for Palestine, the Jewish national movement or indeed any national movement. It becomes plainer every day that the people who are in authority in Germany today care for one thing, and one only—the extension, if need be by force, of the frontiers of Germany. So long as these same men remain at the head of affairs in Germany Jews have little to hope for from them either within Germany or without.

The London Lodge today elected its officeholders for the ensuing year. Bro. Frederick Spiers has been chosen president, and the lodge may be congratulated on his appointment. Who does not know Bro. Spiers? His versatility is truly amazing, and whatever he does he does with his might. A scientist by training, he is as much at home in Hebrew literature as in the latest results of metallurgical research, and his general reading is amazing. With all his manifold activities he yet finds time for enjoying music and the arts. In a man of his all-round training one expects and finds a sane, balanced outlook, and the lodge may look forward to a prosperous year under his leadership. The new president, it need hardly be said, cares much for the sound development of Jewry, and if he gives most thought and time to Jewish education, that is because he is convinced, and rightly convinced, that salvation may be expected from a thoroughly satisfactory system of education. But apart from his interests and his activities, Bro. Spiers has the great capacity for friendship—no mean qualification for the office of president of a lodge of the Order. For vice-president the lodge has taken Bro. Paul Goodman, whose devoted services as general honorary secretary during the last two years merit the greatest gratitude on the part of the lodge. It has been a difficult time; we have all had a great deal of work to do; the war has made immense calls on all of us, directly or indirectly. Yet throughout Bro. Goodman was always on the spot, despite his own extended activities in many directions. It was only fitting therefore to appoint him the president's deputy. The new treasurer is Bro. the Rev. Dayan H. M. Lazarus, one of the most respected of our rabbis, who is admired for his learning and sincerity and earnestness, and who is an asset and an ornament of the first lodge of England For general honorary secretary the choice of the brethren has fallen on Bro. L. H. S. Goldschmidt, and it is hopeful that both he and his colleague. the honorable foreign secretary, Bro. J. Cofman-Nicoresti, are of our younger members. It has always been the policy of the lodge to call on its younger members to share in the responsibility of management with the older members. Clearly it is possible in this way to provide for continuity, and continuity the lodge has had with such excellent results.

A word of thanks is due to the officeholders of last year, and in an especial degree to the retiring president, Bro. S. Gilbert, for his able leadership. One of the features introduced by him which have proved very attractive are the conferences on subjects of the day at which distinguished members and non-members have presented their views. The last of such meetings, to which the public is admitted, was held this afternoon. Sir Lionel Abrahams financial secretary to the India Office, gave the lodge his views on the attitude to be adopted by the community towards the declaration of the British government, and urged that the community should join all its forces in a hearty welcome of the same. In other words, he would act as mediator between the Zionists on the one side and the British Leaguers on the other. It looks as though Sir Lionel's efforts are likely to be successful, and if this meeting had done nothing else than elicit the splendid speech it did from Sir Stuart Samuel, that would have been ample. Ou[illegible] only hope that the pronounce[illegible] the president of the Board of [illegible] at a meeting of the lodge will p[illegible] way for greater co-operation be[illegible] lodge and the board.

The death is announced [illegible] scholars who did much for Jew[illegible] literature. On Feb. 9, Moise Schwab, the learned Talmudist, who was librarian at the National Library in Paris, died there at the age of seventy eight. And from Germany comes the news of the death of Julius Welhausen at the age of seventy-four. Welhausen was the father of modern Biblical criticism, and while it would be idle to deny that he contributed much to the elucidation of the ancient history and literature of the Jews, it must be pointed out that he mixed race hatred in his learning, which was immense. It will be a blot on German Biblical scholarship that it introduced anti-Semitism into its results. Only a German could have been guilty of the bad taste as well as the heartless injustice of saying, when commenting on the Hebrew prophet's denunciation of social injustice, the Jews are still guilty of these social oppressions. It is sad to have to put on record that Welhausen gave the tone to this anti-Semitic Biblical criticism. For the man was a scholar worthy of respect. Perhaps in Palestine, Jews will devote themselves to the elucidation of the Bible and the world will be able to look for guidance not to Germany, but to Zion. Did not the prophet say, "Out of Zion shall go forth the Torah"? Perhaps the University of Jerusalem may be nearer than some people imagine. At least it is one of the positive results that may be expected to emerge from the war.

JEWISH BOARD FOR WELFARE WORK.

An appeal for additional workers to serve as field secretaries at the National Army and National Guard cantonments and camps and with the American forces overseas, is issued by the Jewish Board for Welfare Work in the United States army and navy.

At the present time, seventy field workers are performing active service, having first been graduated from the school for workers established at the National Executive Offices of the Board, 19 West 44th Street, New York City. It is estimated that 200 or more workers will be required before the end of the year to adequately meet the needs of the Jewish men in the military and naval service of the United States, of whom it is estimated that there are now approximately 60,000.

Additional drafts will mean a large accession to the number of soldiers and sailors of Jewish faith and will increase the need of workers. The Board desires to receive applications from men of mature years, preferably, between the ages of 31 and 40, and thus exempt from draft calls.

In addition to providing the workers with the opportunity to perform a patriotic and humanitarian service of which they may be proud, the Board supplies uniforms, subsistence and necessary expenses, and pays the workers salaries according to their ability. About fifteen men are now taking the intensive course at the training school and will be ready for assignment within the next few days.

It is hoped to immediately get on the rolls of the Board as many additional men, possessing suitable qualifications, as may be possible in order to keep the school constantly supplied with pupils, to be graduated in a steady stream into active field service work.

Those desiring to qualify for the post of field workers may communicate with Chester J. Teller, Executive Director. at the National Executive offices, 19 West 44th Street, New York City.

ANTI-SEMITISM IN AUSTRIA.

The new dean of the medical faculty of the University of Cracow, Professor Godlewski, has expelled all Jewish non-matriculated students who registered themselves as members of the Jewish nationality. The dean announced that he was bound to admit the Poles before allowing non-Poles to attend the courses, and that he had no room for non-Poles. The Jewish deputy, Dr. Straucher, has interpollated the Government on the subject in Parliament, inviting the Ministry of Education to take action against the anti-Semitic dean.

From Bohemia and Moravia the information regarding the position of the Jews is very unsatisfactory. The anti-Semitism of the people is growing, and the Jews are subjected to insults and persecution of a shameful character. The Jewish leaders in Vienna are directing their attention to the scandalous exploits of the masses against the Jews.

THE SEASON OF THE FREEDOM.

The thoughts that come to the mind of the Jew year after year at this season strike us with particular force this year. Next year freemen! Such has been the hope for thousands of years. It was uttered in the dark ages of persecution, when the Jew was rightless everywhere, friendless pretty much in every country, groaning under restrictions and discriminations, a pariah subject to jibes and contumely at the hands of passers-by.

At this juncture it is well that we take stock of crusades and pogroms, of blood libels, of black death calumnies, of defamations culminating in the Shylock figure, of hep-hep cries, of social ostracism, of ghetto and pale of settlement, of the recruiting of children under Nicholas I, of the Mortara case. "In every generation they rose against us to destroy us". The Pharaoh was a mere amateur in Jew-baiting, Haman a novice, Apion a mere beginner; the anti-Semites of the nineteenth century outdid them all.

In our own days it was that the weapons wherewith the Jew was fought were refurbished; what had passed for mere hatred born of competition or jealousy was now clothed in scientific and philosophic formulae. Emancipation had brought its blessings, but also its curses; the solidarity of the Jewish people was well nigh crumbling away, and the false estimate of the Jewish character invaded our own midst, and Jew culminated brother-Jew.

But even in the lands where freedom was granted with a full measure, the Jew as he sat down to Seder contemplated with misgivings the fate of his co-religionists in many a country where they were still under civil and economic disabilities. A people cannot be half-free, half-slave. The Jews here and there were free, but the Jewish people was not. And to the extent that the Jew in the East still groaned under intolerable conditions, the free Jew of the West was retarded in his progress. Much was achieved, much more would have been achieved had we not been burdened with wave upon wave of immigrants, exiles for conscience' sake.

Jewish centers kept shifting. Suddenly, the people that walked in darkness saw a great light. In the twinkling of an eye the Russian revolution brought surcease to our brethren whom Czardom and Black Hundreds had enslaved and butchered. But conditions in Russia are far from promising. No one can foretell what the next day may bring.

Still our spirit is not broken. We are a great waiting people. We have survived worse catastrophes and turmoils. The clock of progress cannot be turned back. No matter who wins the war, Jewish rights, because unalienable and grounded in justice, cannot suffer an eclipse.

The world is learning that a stable peace is impossible unless all causes for possible friction are removed. Small nationalities and groups held together like the Jews by ties of blood and a common history cannot be tossed to and fro like pawns in a game. As Americans we are committed to the cause of the Allies. Our President has, time and again, lifted up his voice on behalf of the feebler groups. We pin our hope in him and statesmen like him.

Next year freemen! With the rest of humanity we long for an honorable, stable, enduring peace. We want to see the Jew everywhere placed on a par with his fellow-citizens. If Palestine should be turned over to the Jewish people living there, it would mean a step in advance. But this is not merely the season of our freedom, it is our season of freedom. We celebrate the day upon which a slave-nation was made free, when, for the first time the principle of self-determination was enunciated. Then liberty was proclaimed not merely for the Jew, but for all the world. And so our hope includes every down-trodden nationality.

This year slaves, may next year see them as freemen! Then, with us, mankind shall celebrate the great Passover of the future, when liberty will be worldwide, and all nations, the small and the great, live in peace and amity with each other, that every one of them may be free to develop the best that is in it for the common good of mankind.

May the year 1918 be the year of redemption for the whole world, for Jew and Gentile alike. Humanity to do its task upon earth cannot be half-free, half-slave. For the sake of humanity, then, we say: This year slaves, next year freemen!

STATISTICS OF UNBELIEF

A professor of psychology in one of our woman's colleges has taken to gathering statistics on the subject of unbelief. He has broken away himself from whatever religious traditions he had, and so he is eager to show how great the number of those who share his unbelief. He has examined, he tells us, all the current prayer books and books of devotion, and he finds there prayers for rain (for the weather, as the professor expresses himself), for the healing of disease, for food and sustenance, and what not. All of which implies a conception of a God who enters into direct communion with the individual and is willing and able to interfere with the course of nature on behalf of human beings. He has sent out a questionnaire to physicians, biologists, psychologists, to students in colleges. The percentage of believers is largest among women students; among the scientists, the psychologists stand at the apex of unbelief, and generally the scientists of lesser attainments are more prone to belief. The professor argues that those who have learned to find law in the workings of nature and the human mind naturally break away from traditions which rest on the mere assumption of faith. He furthermore has scanned the utterances of modern writers on religion and he finds that at best they vindicate for prayer a subjective potency and sum up religion in terms of social service. Now as a matter of fact, his statistics prove rather that belief is much more widely current than one would be apt to assume. The truth is that the average recipient of the questionnaire is by no means prepared to answer. Few people have analyzed their beliefs. The question of the reality of God and of prayer is not one to be put to a vote. Of course, when physicists and psychologists distribute among themselves the world, there is little left for other people who may claim to have a truer perception of things religious. We deny that because the psychologist makes a study of feelings he is also competent to evaluate religious emotions. They cannot be weighed or experimented upon. You cannot put them in a laboratory retort. Where the religious emotions are atrophied, there can but be a lack of appreciation for them. Let the professor be assured that the potency of prayer rests upon the reality of a God who hears prayer. It may be an illusion, but the believer deems it a reality. Religion is the attitude of dependence. Its natural expression is prayer. It is our confession of weakness. But unless we can believe that there is strength somewhere in the world, the mere cry for help will not relieve us. This talk of the immanent God is old as the hills. It is not a new heresy. The great heathen of Weimar poked fun at the God who pushes the universe from without. But let us not forget that the God who is only within and who is therefore lost in the universe resides not only in the good, but also in the evil, in the prostitute as well as in the saint. But God means to us the ideal of goodness and purity. Hence God must be above the world, a Holy Being, uncontaminated by the sin of the world. There are vain prayers, as the rabbis say. There are also fatuous prayers, as the same teachers aver. But religions must be judged by their highest expression.

Surely a Christian-born man should not find fault with the prayer, "Thy will be done", which his Master taught him to pray. It is, of course, the Jewish Kaddish. "Extolled be and hallowed His great name in the world which He created according to His will". Submission to God's will is the height of religious devotion. We ask for the things He is able to give us. We sometimes ask for more. But then that is natural in our state of weakness. The look of dependence with which the child turns to the parent has in it the religious emotion. It implies helplessness appealing to helpfulness by virtue of the bond of love that unites them both. And as for social service taking the place of prayer and worship, it is a plain folly. Religion takes in social service, but it is more than that. Of course, those who disbelieve in God may find solace in an orphaned humanity huddling together and binding up the wounds which are often inflicted by one man upon another. We will hold fast to the faith in Him who is the Father of the fatherless and the Judge of the widow and the Friend of the weak. Meanwhile, we are minded to continue our prayers, whether in our private woes or in our public calamities. Let the psychologist explain it as he may, but the fact remains that humanity has not unlearned prayer. And when our emotions are purified by prayer, we shall be readier for the social service. Forget prayer and God, and the bottom will be knocked out from under our entire social fabric.

AUSTRIAN DEPUTIES PLEAD FOR ROUMANIAN JEWS

The Jewish deputies of the Austrian Reichsrath brought in an interpellation to the government regarding the position of the Jews in Roumania. The interpellation calls attention to the condition of the Jews in Roumania and to the cruel treatment accorded them there. The Austrian and German governments are appealed to that when peace negotiations with Roumania will be in progress the Jews should be accorded there full and equal rights with all the other nationalities in that land. The Jewish deputies also point out the faithlessness of the Roumanian government in their shirking the solemn promise made so many times to accord equal rights to the Jews. The answer of the government to this interpellation is awaited with intense interest by all Jews.

It is reported that the Roumanian troops sweeping over Bessarabia have practically laid waste all the Jewish towns of the district, killing and plundering the Jewish inhabitants ruthlessly. At first, the Roumanian troops arrived in Bessarabia for the purpose of protecting the land from the Bolsheviki excesses. This, however, was soon forgotten and the soldiers began to rob and plunder and kill on their own account. The district is thickly inhabited by Jews and their fate is said to be frightful.

LOVING CUP GIVEN TO MARCUS FEUCHTWANGER, PRESIDENT OF DISTRICT GRAND LODGE NO. 3.

A special meeting of New Castle Lodge, No. 609, of New Castle, Pa., was held on Saturday afternoon, March 3, 1918, in honor of Bro. Marcus Feuchtwanger of that city, who was recently elected president of District Grand Lodge No. 3.

The meeting was opened by Jas. M. Ehrlich, president of New Castle Lodge, who introduced B. A. Winternitz as chairman for the afternoon.

The program carried out was as follows:

Address of welcome, B. A. Winternitz.

RECEPTION TO PRESIDENT M. P. DAVIDSON.

Brooklyn Lodge, No. 753, gave a reception to the newly elected president of the district, Maurice P, Davidson, Wednesday evening, March 6. Several prominent brothers from different parts of the district attended the reception. Bro. Clarence G. Bachrach presided. Among those who spoke on the occasion were: First Vice-President of the District; Bro. Charles H. Shapiro, of Bridgeport; Second Vice-President of District, Bro. Henry Lasker; Bro. Herman Asher, treasurer of the District; Bro. Clarence G. Bachrach and President Bro. Maurice P. Davidson, responded in his usual happy manner.

Bro. Maurice P. Davidson, President of the District, is, with the co-operation of the presidents of the various lodges and the chairmen of the state board of deputies, arranging mass meetings to be held all through New England and New York state on April 6, the first anniversary of our entrance into the war, on which occasion a special appeal will be made to our brothers to help in the work of the Third Liberty Loan. It is expected that millions of dollars will thus be raised through the 48 lodges of the district.

JEWS IN JERUSALEM DECREASED BY 40 PER CENT.

According to cabled information just received by the Palestine Restoration Fund Commission, the Jewish population of Jerusalem has decreased about 40 per cent since the war began. There are now only about 33,000 Jews in the Holy City. Disease, starvation and expulsions under the Turkish rule have disposed of 20,000 of the Jewish inhabitants in the three and a half years since the war began.

News just received from Palestine indicates that with the advance of the British armies into Palestine the Turks indulged in wholesale deportations of Jews from the seaport towns, but in many cases they are now returning.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

The Ladies' Auxiliary of the I. O. B. B. of Los Angeles, Cal., extends through the columns of this paper, to members of the B'nai B'rith Order and their families who contemplate coming to Los Angeles, either temporarily or permanently, an invitation to communicate with the President of the Auxiliary, Mrs. H. H. Harris, 512 Heliotrope Drive, who has a standing committee at her service that will be glad to meet such members and their families who desire the guidance and advice of Jewish citizens of Los Angeles, such as meeting strangers at the various railroad stations, finding suitable accommodations for them, or rendering any other service that may be desired.

ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE

The administrative committee of the Anti-Defamation League has met regularly each week to consider the various complaints received from all parts of the country. In view of the fact that many of these complaints refer to the Jew as a slacker, the committee issued the following circular to the members of the executive committee calling upon them for especial vigilance at this time:

To the Members of the Executive Committee:

Now, more than ever, must the members of our league be vigilant in all matters pertaining to the defamation of the Jew. A number of articles have appeared in newspapers and in current magazines, blaming the Jews for the ills now being endured by the Russian people. Stories, cartoons and jokes suggesting that the Jew is a "slacker" and a poor soldier have appeared in several magazines. In each case, when the matter was called to our attention, we have succeeded in convincing the publishers that in view of the fact that there are at the present time in the United States army over 75,000 men of the Jewish faith, many of whom enlisted of their own accord, these articles are untrue and are a menace to the unity and general good will which our government is seeking to encourage at this time.

At the last meeting of the managing board of the Anti-Defamation League, a committee consisting of Hon. Philip Stein, chairman, Judge Hugo Pam, Judge Joseph B. David, Mr. A. D. Weiner, and Mr. B. J. Samuels, to be known as the administrative committee, was appointed to meet weekly to consider all cases of this nature. Mr. L. Edward Lashman was elected secretary to succeed Mr. Leon L. Lewis, who is now with the American Expeditionary Forces in France.

All complaints, unless they pertain to matters purely local in scope and where immediate action is necessary, should be referred to this committee, which will act promptly in each case. A reply to this communication would be very much appreciated. Sincerely yours,

Managing Board,
L. EDWARD LASHMAN
Secretary.

Complaint was received by the committee because of a performance given at one of the Y. M. C. A. shacks at Camp Devens, Ayer, Mass. One of the vaudeville performers, while giving some characterizations, announced that he would impersonate a Jew, prefacing his act by the following sentence: "See how a human being can change himself into a Hebrew." This matter was promptly brought to the attention of the executive officers of the National War Work Council of the Y. M. C. A. We received a letter of apology from the director of recreational work, who advised us that a special circular had been issued to all the Y. M. C. A. camp secretaries calling upon them to be particularly careful not to permit impersonations of any kind whatsoever. We also received a letter from the general camp secretary at Camp Devens, in which he explained that the professional entertainer had arrived only just in time to start his entertainment, so that the Y. M. C. A. officials were given no opportunity to censor his act. He assured us that there would be no repetition of such an offense. Incidentally he informed us that the performer was a member of our own faith.

We complained to the Des Moines Register and Tribune because of an article in which the Jew was blamed for a great deal of the diplomatic relations existing between the warring nations. The editors of the paper apologized very profusely for having permitted this article to appear in their paper. They explained that it was caused by the neglect of one of their sub-editors to submit the article for approval.

A letter was received from the editors of the Saturday Evening Post, denying any intention on their part to create a feeling against the Jewish people. A letter of protest had been written to them because of an article appearing in the Saturday Evening Post entitled "Broken Icons," in which several unpleasant references were made to the Jewish people.

Perhaps the most flagrant act of defamation which has ever been brought to the attention of the Anti-Defamation League was that of the sentence appearing in the manual of instructions issued to Medical Advisory Boards conducting examinations of selected men. Under a chapter headed, "Causes of malingering," appeared the following sentence: "The foreign born, and especially Jews, are more apt to malinger than the native born." The members of the administrative committee acted immediately. Just as a committee which had wired for an appointment with the President was about to leave for Washington our representative in Washington wired us that the President had written to Mr. Crowell, acting secretary of war, as follows: "I am very much distressed that the sentence quoted in the enclosed telegram should have been contained in the drafted instructions to the Medical Advisory Boards. They, of course, represent a view absolutely contrary to that of the administration and express a prejudice which ought never to have been expressed or entertained. In all of this I am sure you will agree with me and I hope that you will be kind enough to make an immediate excision of these sentences and instruct the Medical Advisory Boards accordingly, letting it be known if you will be kind enough, to the senders of the enclosed telegrams that you have done so.

I am making this request with all the greater confidence, because I am sure you will sympathize with my point of view in the matter."

Members of Advisory Boards have been notified by telegraph of the change made in the manual. A new edition of the manual is being issued to take the place of the old instructions which are being withdrawn.

GERMAN JEWS AND THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

A conference of delegates of all important Jewish bodies in Germany has been held at Berlin. The Hilfsverein, the Central Union of German Jews, the Union of Liberal Jews, the German Jewish Communal Union, the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith, the Committee for Eastern Questions, the Zionist Organization, and other bodies were represented. Herr James Simon, Drs. Paul Nathan, Hantke, Klee, and Oppenheimer, Consul-General Landau and Judicial Privy Councillor Cassell, took a leading part in the proceedings, which were devoted to arriving at an understanding on united action with reference to the Jewish demands to be presented to the Peace Congress. The gathering took the view that that Congress would undoubtedly discuss the Palestinian problem and the status of the Jews in Eastern Europe, and it elected an Executive to prepare a plan for united representation on behalf of Jewry. In spite of all difficulties in the matter of obtaining a formula capable of uniting all parties, the prospects of an understanding are regarded as bright in view of the general desire that the Jews should present a common front.

MANY JEWS GET HARVARD SCHOLARSHIPS

Over Seventy-eight Awards Out of Three Hundred.

Harvard's announcement of the awards of scholarships has just been made, and 295 students are thus designated as the ranking scholars of the college. Seventy-eight are Jewish young men. Group I is made up of those under-graduates whose work in the preceding college year entitles them to "very high academic distinction". No student is admitted to this group until his record for the preceding year, in all his course, has been carefully inspected and the question of his fitness has been submitted to every one of his teachers.

Only very high grades in his studies and concurrent testimony in his favor from a sufficient number of his teachers enable the committee on scholarships and other aids for under-graduates to recommend him for a position in the first group. John Harvard scholarships are given only to students deemed worthy of a position in the first group.

Group II is made up of students of "marked excellence" and Group III, of students to whom financial aid has been awarded on grounds of special claims.

ARKANSAS JEWISH RELIGIOUS TEACHERS MEET.

At the twelfth annual convention of the Arkansas Jewish Religious School Teachers, held at Helena, there was for the first time an out-of-state lecturer invited, namely, Professor J. C. Lauterbach of the Hebrew Union College of Cincinnati. A number of interesting papers were read and discussed. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, Rabbi Pizer Jacobs, Helena; vice-president, Rabbi Raphael Goldenstein, Pine Bluff; secretary, Miss Ruth Ottenheimer, Little Rock; treasurer, Rabbi A. B. Rhine, Hot Springs; executive committee, Rabbi Louis Witt, Little Rock and Rabbi Charles Latz, Fort Smith. The delegates were most hospitably entertained and were the recipients of much social attention from the Jewish residents of Helena.

RECEPTION TENDERED MR. MORRIS SCHAFFNER BY THE B'NAI B'RITH AND JEWISH COMMUNITY OF ERIE, PA.

Erie Lodge, No. 620 and the Jewish community of Erie tendered Mr. Morris Schaffner a reception in honor of his election to the office of second vice president of District Grand Lodge, No. 3, Independent Order B'nai B'rith, on Sunday evening, Feb. 18. The gathering was a notable one; more than 200 people were present—showing the high esteem and honor in which Mr. Schaffner is held in this community.

Mr. I. Loeb, president of Erie Lodge, No. 620, presided.

A solo was rendered by Mrs. Snorman. Mr. Loeb then introduced Mr. L. Landsberg, friend and co-worker of Mr. Schaffner. Mr. Landsberg gave a brief account of the proceedings of the Wheeling convention. He then paid a high tribute to Mr. Schaffner's ability and integrity.

Mrs. J. B. Pollak then rendered a solo, and then Rabbi Max C. Currick was called upon to express the sentiments of the assembled guests. In the course of his address he spoke as follows: "Morris Schaffner has been elected to the high office of Second Vice-President because District No. 3 realized that he deserved this promotion, because of his faithful service to the Grand Lodge. I've known Mr. Schaffner almost 20 years, and I still have to learn of an occasion when he was not ready to do and to serve. We can show Mr. Schaffner how much we appreciate his work by getting behind him and helping him. District No. 3 aims to double its membership during the coming two years; Mr. Schaffner will work with all his being to achieve this object, and we can help him in his efforts." He then spoke of Mr. Schaffner's activities in the community and showed how his influence and untiring efforts were visible everywhere.

Miss Duttenhoffer then sang several beautiful selections.

Rabbi J. B. Pollak, superintendent of the B'nai B'rith Orphanage, was then introduced, and delivered on address on the work which the orphanage is doing. "It is particularly appropriate," said he, "that I speak to you tonight of the orphanage, because Mr. Schaffner has been so interested in it from the time of its foundation. He was instrumental in bringing it to Erie, and his interest in the orphanage has grown with the years. All the children know and love Mr. Schaffner for he is constantly thinking and working for their welfare and well-being." Rabbi Pollak then gave a vivid picture of the orphanage, its work and its activities. "Ours is a cottage plan orphanage," said he, "We had gotten away from the congregate plan because we want to give our children as normal a home life as possible. Visitors at once notice the difference between our children and other orphanage children. Ours are a natural, happy and contented lot."

Mrs. M. Levy, daughter of Mr. Schaffner, then sang "The End of a Perfect Day," which was enjoyed by all.

Mr. Schaffner then arose, and thanked Erie Lodge, No. 620 and the Jewish community of Erie and all his friends in the district for the honor they had conferred upon him. "I have long desired this honor," said Mr. Schaffner, "not for any personal or selfish reasons, but because it will give me greater opportunities for serving the Order and furthering its interests. What I have done in the past will be as nothing compared with what I hope to do in the future with your help and co-operation. We hope to raise the membership of our lodge to 350 and we can do it if we but work together." Mr. Schaffner then spoke of the work of the Order and made a plea that more interest be manifested in its good work.

Immediately after the addresses all the assembled guests adjourned to the banquet room where refreshments were served. All those who were privileged to attend the reception will long remember the evening spent so pleasantly and interestingly.

FINNISH JEWS EMANCIPATED AT LAST.

The bill granting full civil and political rights to the Jews in Finland has at length become law. The struggle for these rights was long and strenuous.

CAPT. TRUMPELDOR'S TRIUMPH.

Captain Trumpeldor has received permission from the Bolshevik Government to organize all Jewish soldiers stationed in the district of Petrograd into a separate regiment for the purposes of self-defense. The Jewish soldiers eagerly joined the regiment, and are now ready to defend their coreligionists.

FOREWORD.

The only foreword that seems so appropriate is a word of congratulation to those into whose hands this book may fall. No introduction is necessary to the book itself, for wherever it is opened it will make itself charmingly familiar. No introductions of the author can be needed, because he is his own introducer, introducing both himself and others, and no one else could do it better. You have only to accept the offered hand and go with him on his interesting way.

You will find here a large company of distinguished people aside from the presidents themselves, whom you are especially invited to meet. You will find yourself refreshing your recollection of a great period in American history. You will get many glimpses of what was going on behind the scenes in Washington. You will listen to delightful stories. You will be touched by pathetic incidents. You will be moved to laughter and perhaps to tears. You will see the anxious face of Buchanan, the haggard, far-away look of Lincoln, the narrow, self-willed expression of Johnson, the imperturbable demeanor of Grant, the gracious personality of Hayes, the large, magnetic presence of Garfield, the courtly bearing of Arthur, the indomitable figure of Cleveland, the cold, self-possession of Harrison, the winning smile of McKinley, the restless and virile movements of Roosevelt, the massive form and bland good-fellowship of Taft, and accomplished ease and dignity of Wilson. You will find yourself present at many interesting meetings, where your presence will not hinder the free disclosure of personal traits in these and other noted characters of the time, and as you move through the changing scenes, you will come to have a warm admiration for your conductor—so witty, so full of intelligence and kindly human interest, so frank and engaging in his revelation of himself and his activities, so devoted to the welfare of his people, so indefatigable in his efforts, so eloquent in his appeals, so broad in his sympathies, so unqualifiedly American in all he does and says. Born in a little town in Bavaria, feeling the heel of the oppressor in his youth, coming to this country while yet a boy, "clerking it" in a country store, studying law and securing admission to the bar, coming to Washington at the beginning of the Civil War and entering at once upon the public spirited and benevolent tasks which have occupied his days from then till now, winning the confidence of leading men, broadening and strengthening his influence, using all he gained for the service of his less fortunate fellows, making himself a new sort of tribune of the helpless and needy in the departments of power, filling important positions at home and abroad, enlarging the circle of his friends till they include all sorts and conditions of men, and becoming in his own way the typical man of his race in this country, he has been nothing more truly or more completely than this—a fearless, honest, uncompromising defender of free principles, a loyal and patriotic American.

That, I am sure, is what he would be willing I should say in attempting to describe him. He passed his seventieth birthday amid grateful acclamations. He has now passed his eightieth with still increasing praise, and he is doing well to give us in these pages a record, incomplete though it must be, of the striking events of which he has been a part, with faithful portraits of the eminent personages he has known.

The lesson taught by this volume will not be overlooked at a time when some are skeptical enough to doubt the loyalty of large numbers of their fellow citizens born under other skies, many of whom are perhaps more capable than we ourselves of measuring the wide gulf between free and despotic institutions, and who are no less determined than we that "government of the people, by the people and for the people shall not perish from the earth."

Wendell Phillips Stafford.

This Foreword is written by Justice Wendell Phillips Stafford of the District of Columbia, whose memorable address at the general convention banquet held in Washington, will be remembered by all those present, as well as by the readers of the News. This "Foreword" will be inserted in the forthcoming book of Bro. Simon Wolf, "The Presidents I Have Known" and we hope that each and every member and reader of the News will subscribe for one or more copies. The price is $2.00. Send subscriptions direct to Bro. Simon Wolf, Woodward Building, Washington, D. C.

THE AMERICAN SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' WELFARE LEAGUE OF THE INDEPENDENT ORDER OF B'NAI B'RITH

It is now six months since the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith engaged actively in the work of providing recreational facilities in the towns adjacent to cantonments. From all over the country the central office has received letters of congratulation and commendation because of the work being done. In each case the work has met with the approval of the representatives of the Fosdick Commission, who have in many cases gone out of their way to praise the work of the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League. Reports of the work by camps follow.

Camp Bowie, Fort Worth, Texas.

The Hebrew Institute at Fort Worth has become the rendezvous of the soldiers who come into the city. Each week affairs are arranged for their entertainment. A series of musical and literary programs have been arranged for nearly every night in the week and the soldiers who come to the Institute are always sure of a cordial welcome. During the month of January, eight extensive entertainments were given at the Hebrew Institute under the auspices of the I. O. B. B. Each of these entertainments was followed by a dance, after which refreshments were served. During the month of February, seven large affairs were given at the Institute, one of which was given under the auspices of the local Y. M. H. A., another under the auspices of the Council of Jewish Women, and the third by the Isidor Strauss Lodge, No. 519, I. O. B. B.

Visits to the camp hospital were made as usual. Committees from the town very often accompanied the director in these visits to the boys, on each occasion distributing fruit and magazines to the sick soldiers. The Ladies' Auxiliary of the Hebrew Institute knitted a large quantity of foot warmers which were distributed to every Jewish and non-Jewish soldier at the base hospital.

Gratifying results have been achieved in the matter of providing loans to the soldiers. In nearly every instance this money has been returned by the men. Most of these loans are used by the men for purchasing railroad tickets to visit their relatives.

The Hebrew Institute is splendidly equipped for this recreational work. A recent addition to the institution was a library of 125 volumes placed there by the American Library Association, to be known as the Soldiers' Circulating Library.

The Young Men's Hebrew Association of Fort Worth threw open their club rooms to the men of Jewish faith, each Jewish man being given honorary membership, entitling him to full membership privileges. The Y. M. H. A. is equipped with a large gymnasium, shower room, dressing room, pool and billiard tables, etc.

Mr. Roy Smith Wallace, district secretary of the Fosdick War Service Commission, has been very profuse in his praise of the work being done by the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League.

Camp Beauregard, Alexandria, La.

On Feb. 27, we received a letter from our director, Mr. Samuel C. Blumenthal, advising us that the quarantine in the camp has been raised. There is still a restriction, however, on public functions for soldiers so that the Jewish community of Alexandria is not yet able to make arrangements for the entertainment of the soldiers. The first entertainment for the soldiers was given upon the occasion of the installation of the officers of the B'nai B'rith Lodge.

The division headquarters of the camp show that there are stationed at the present time at Camp Beauregard, 180 men of the Jewish faith. Mr. Blumenthal's roster accounts for 134. A complete list of the Jewish men stationed at the camp has been compiled.

Visits to the base hospital have continued as usual. Many acts of personal service have been rendered, both to the men and their families. Numerous letters were written by Mr. Blumenthal to the families of boys who were too ill to be able to write to their relatives.

Camp Shelby, Hattiesburg, Miss.

The work of the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League at Hattiesburg has been officially recognized and has been commended highly by the Fosdick representatives at Hattiesburg. Mr. S. London, the I. O. B. B. representative at Camp Shelby, has been made a member of the executive committee of the War Camp Community Service Board.

Mr. Katz reports that the attendance at the headquarters for the past month totalled 2083, that these men had written 640 letters and that 357 men have made use of the cots which are provided for the men who are compelled to spend the night in the city. A number of acts of personal service has been rendered to the soldiers, particularly to men who have been recently discharged. Twenty or more Jewish boys are placed for Sunday dinners at the homes of the Jewish residents each week.

Camp Dodge, Des Moines, Iowa.

The Friday night services at the Y. M. C. A. building in the camp have proven most interesting. Mr. Wolff has been able to secure the services of cantors from among the men in the camp. Many of these services are conducted by Private Abraham Geckler, a former Chazan and rabbi.

On Saturday, Feb. 2, a dancing party was given at the I. O. B. B. headquarters to which the men of Companies A to N of the 163rd Depot Brigade, and the Medical Corps were invited.

On Sunday, Feb. 3, the men of the infantry, artillery, engineers and quartermaster corps were invited by the ladies of Temple B'nai Jeshurun to a supper and dance in the Temple vestry rooms.

On Feb. 19, the ladies of Tifereth Israel entertained forty soldiers at a dancing party at the headquarters.

On Saturday evening, Feb. 23, a dancing party was given at the headquarters under the auspices of the ladies of Congregation Shaare Zedek. A series of Sunday afternoon entertainments has been arranged, at which well known speakers and talented musicians will participate in programs of unusual interest. The first of these entertainments consisted of an illustrated talk by Prof. Daniel W. Moorehouse, of Drake University, who addressed the soldiers on the subject, "Objects Beyond our Senses."

On Feb. 26, an old-fashioned Purim Ball was held at the headquarters. Arrangements were made through the division adjutant, whereby special leave of absence was given to the Jewish men who desire to attend this entertainment.

A number of other affairs were given during the past month, including a large dance given at one of the hotels by the Jewish young men of Des Moines. The regular entertainments, dancing classes and amateur performances by the soldiers themselves continue as usual at the headquarters. A total of nearly five hundred visits was recorded at the headquarters, other than at the regular entertainments. During the past month a number of knitted articles were distributed to the Jewish men stationed at Camp Dodge.

Camp Lewis, Tacoma, Wash.

The B'nai B'rith Club House established at Tacoma for the men stationed at Camp Lewis, has proven a decided success. The building consists of a remodeled, beautiful fourteen room residence. It stands on an elevated corner facing the Sound. The building is equipped with reception rooms, writing rooms, music room, pool room, shower rooms, game rooms, etc. One hundred beds are provided for soldiers who are obliged to spend the night in the town. The demand for these beds has been so great that it is the intention of those in charge of the recreation headquarters to furnish additional equipment for this purpose. The local community of Tacoma has been thoroughly organized for soldier welfare work. Members of the lodge and their ladies are constantly in attendance to welcome the soldier visitors. A series of entertainments is being arranged, more details of which will appear in the next issue of the B'nai B'rith News.

Camp Logan, Houston, Texas.

The weekly reports from Mr. Freefield, I. O. B. B. representative at Camp Logan, show great activity at the headquarters. The attendance for the week ending Feb. 2 totalled 525, for the week ending Feb. 11, 575, for the week ending Feb. 17, 600, for the week ending Feb. 24, 700, and for the week ending March 2, the attendance amounted to over 750. An average of thirty Jewish men are placed for Sunday dinners at the homes of the Jewish residents.

An average of two entertainments were given at the headquarters each week during the month of February, besides the entertainments given elsewhere by the Jewish community.

The most enjoyable entertainment for the month was the one given at the Concordia Club on Saturday night, Feb. 23, under the auspices of the I. O. B. B. Major Blech, Assistant Division Surgeon at Camp Logan, delivered an address on the "Moral Aspect of This War." The rest of the program included a piano solo by Miss Elvira Elmen, classic dancing by Miss Else Rosenthal, a vocal solo by Miss Hilda Mullane, a reading by Billie Stout, a piano solo by Miss Alice Heidingsfelder, a vocal solo by Miss Frances O'Barr, a reading by Miss Ruth Wolf, and dancing by Miss Margaret Giesendanner. The music at these entertainments is furnished by the members of the various military bands, practically all of whom are non-Jews.

Through the efforts of the Houston lodges, a very efficient organization has been effected for the purpose of conducting soldier welfare work. Mr. Meyer C. Wagner, president of the Houston branch of the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League has appointed the following chairmen of committees to direct the work: Mrs. I. Gerson, chairman of the base hospital visiting committee. This committee has undertaken to visit each of the Jewish men in the hospitals at least two or three times each week. The boys are provided with tooth brushes and tooth paste, soap, handkerchiefs, socks, sweaters, fruit and magazines. Mrs. Louis Sinsheimer is chairman of the home entertainment committee. This committee has for its object, the entertainment of the Jewish boys in the homes of Houston residents. As many as fifty boys per week have been placed for Sunday dinners. Mr. Albert Bath is chairman of the finance committee, which has undertaken to finance the work in Houston. Mr. Jake H. Sam, chairman of the entertainment committee, conducted the B'nai B'rith Chanukah Ball, which besides entertaining over six hundred soldiers, netted over $350.00. Mr. H. Bergman is chairman of the lodges and fraternities committees, whose object it is to co-ordinate the activities of all lodges and fraternities so that no duplication of effort will occur in soldier welfare work. The religious work committee is in charge of Mr. J. L. Aronson. Through this committee, services and patriotic talks are provided for the men in camp and at the headquarters. Through this committee over five hundred Bibles were distributed to the Jewish men. Mr. Henry Cook is chairman of the committee on public comfort and census. This committee has taken up the work of assisting men in securing employment after their discharge from the army. It also assists men in locating boarding houses and acts as an information committee for soldiers and their dependent families. Through the committee on complaints and relief, of which Mr. Sam Lewis is chairman, valuable service has been rendered and many cases of relief were handled in conjunction with the United Jewish Charities. This committee also takes charge of the loans given to the soldiers. Two other committees are the medical committee, of which Dr. Louis J. Spivak is chairman, and the legal committee, of which Mr. Meyer C. Wagner is chairman. These committees respectively, give medical and legal advice to soldiers in the service.

Camp Sherman, Chillicothe, Ohio.

Feb. 3, marked the date of the opening of the B'nai B'rith Club at Chillicothe, Ohio. The exercises were attended by the officers of District Grand Lodge, No. 2. Addresses were made by prominent officials of the city of Chillicothe and by representatives of the Fosdick Commission and by officers from the camp. The headquarters consists of several bright and cheerful rooms equipped with comfortable furniture, reading and writing facilities, pool and billiard tables, etc. Entertainments are being provided by the Jewish community of Chillicothe and also by the communities of other cities in the state of Ohio. Informal programs are held every Saturday afternoon and evening. Refreshments are served to the boys at all these functions.

Large numbers of men have already made use of the headquarters, although at the time of the writing of this article the rooms had been opened only two weeks. The rooms have become a meeting place for soldiers and their relatives. A dancing class is held each Monday evening, and Tuesday evening instruction is given in boxing. The men seem to get a great deal of enjoyment in the amateur bouts being staged. On Wednesday evenings, entertainments are given by the Jewish community in the Knights of Columbus building in the camp. These entertainments are proving very successful. Friday evening is set aside for religious services at the headquarters. These services are conducted by Rabbi Joseph Leiser, the I. O. B. B. representative in the camp.

Camp Grant, Rockford, Ill.

Mr. Horvitz, our director at Camp Grant, submits the following report:

On Feb. 24, through the courtesy of the Chicago section, Council of Jewish Women, an entertainment was given the boys of the camp. The committee of which Mrs. H. G. Solomon of Chicago was chairman, arranged a program of vocal solos and dance numbers. After the said program, music for dancing was furnished by a six piece orchestra from the 343rd Infantry for this occasion. About one hundred young ladies from Chicago came to Rockford to help entertain the boys. The affair commenced at 2:30 in the afternoon and lasted until 8 in the evening, the entire attendance being about five hundred. The entertainment was given in commemoration of Washington's birthday and of the Purim Festival, and it can be modestly spoken of as one of the leading affairs given at our headquarters. Supper was of course served to all the soldiers and to the other guests.

On Tuesday, Feb. 26, Purim, our local ladies committee arranged an informal Purim party for the boys. A pleasant evening was spent around our headquarters, which was topped off by the usual refreshments provided by our local refreshment committee and the various Chicago women's organizations which have been so kind to us in the past. The attendance on this occasion was about one hundred.

On March 10, the 343rd Infantry Band, the most famous band in the national army, whose leader, C. B. Price, has recently been put in charge of the 86th Division Band, gave a concert of eight numbers, which was thoroughly enjoyed by all present, there being an attendance of over three hundred. After the regular concert, a jazz orchestra of eleven pieces furnished music for dancing which was participated in by all present including quite a few of the young ladies from Chicago who happened to be visiting the boys at the camp on that day Supper as usual was served by our refreshment committee, the results o whose tireless efforts on behalf of the boys continues to be one of the outstanding features of our work at Rockford For Passover, for those boys who do no go home on the usual furlough, an elaborate seder is being arranged to which it is planned to invite all the privates non-commissioned officers and commissioned officers of our faith in the camp The attendance at our headquarters varies from about 400 a week to 800 a week, depending upon character of the particular affair which may be arranged on any one occasion.

Our library has been augmented recently by new books and is being used considerably by the soldiers who read at our headquarters and who are also allowed to take any books they desire to their barracks. A considerable amount of knitted wear has been distributed among the new boys in the last contingent of draftees and smileage books have been passed out to such boys as is felt will appreciate the courtesy of such a gift. The hospitals continue to be visited as in the past. Happily be it said, there are very few of ou Jewish boys ill there at present. Through the courtesy of Mr. Louis Fenniger o Rockford, Ill., a moving picture projecting machine has been placed at our disposal and through the courtesy of the Metro Film Service of America we are in a position to give moving picture shows weekly without any expense to our association and without any charge to the boys. Arrangements are now being made for the erection of the necessary booth to house the machine. When this is finished, movies will be a weekly event. With the approach of summer when the boys will of course be more out of doors, plans are being formulated to make our headquarters as cool and attractive as possible and to inaugurate forms of light entertainment, suc s the so called hop concerts, etc., which re the ordinary attraction of the spring nd summer season in any community.

Camp Greene, Charlotte, N. C.

While the American Soldiers' and ailors' Welfare League established no eadquarters at Charlotte, the Jewish ommunity, under the direction of Char- otte Lodge, No. 733, I. O. B. B., under- ook and carried out an extensive rec- eational program. One of the rooms f the Temple was thoroughly altered, o that now accomodations are provided or 350 visitors. The chairman of the Charlotte committee on Training Camp ctivities, representing the Fosdick Commission, declared this to be the best quipped and best managed of all the hurch recreation headquarters of the ity, of which there are ten in Charlotte. The members of the lodge and their adies take turns in acting as hosts to he boys each night at the headquarters. Each Wednesday night a dance is given t the headquarters.

Chicago, Ill.

Through the efforts of Mrs. M. A. Weinberg, a series of entertainments is being provided for by the Jewish Women's Clubs of Chicago. These entertainments will be given at the B'nai B'rith headquarters at Rockford and at he new headquarters to be established t Waukegan for the men at the Naval Training Station at Great Lakes, Ill.

Another large entertainment at Rockford is being planned by the Chicago Women's Aid.

On Feb. 23, Sinai Temple Sisterhood gave a dance and entertainment at which over fifty jackies were present. During the month of March entertainments will be provided each week end for the Jewish boys at the Great Lakes Naval Training Station.

On Wednesday evening, March 6, a piano recital by Myrtle Elvyn Bloch was given by the Isaiah Women's Club at Isaiah Temple. A most entertaining program was rendered. The entire proceeds of this entertainment was turned over to the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League.

On Sunday evening, Feb. 24, a minstrel show was given by Ramah Lodge, No. 33. Although the minstrel show was given at the Hotel La Salle, it was impossible to accomodate the crowd, over five hundred of whom were refused admission. It is estimated that between twelve hundred and fifteen hundred dollars will be netted as a result of this entertainment.

Great interest is centered in the community seder to be given at Waukegan for the Jewish men stationed at Great Lakes, Ill. The B'nai B'rith is planning to entertain between 150 and 200 men at these exercises.

The usual number of letters were received at the central office from soldiers and their families. One of the most interesting letters was that received from Private Joseph A. Feldman of Company Q, Det. Division, A. O. B. D. F., Camp Dodge, Des Moines, Iowa. It is a most optimistic and inspiring letter and breathes the spirit of democracy which is the possession of our Jewish men now serving in our country's forces. He praises the work of the Y. M. C. A., the Knights of Columbus, and the I. O. B. B., and expresses his gratification at the cordial treatment rendered the Jewish boys by the Jewish community of Des Moines.

The following letter was addressed to Mr. Joseph Wolff, the I. O. B. B. representative at Camp Dodge.

"Dear Sir:

I received a letter from my son and was very glad to hear that the I. O. B. B. is taking so much interest in the Jewish boys in camp.

I can imagine how the boys far from home feel when a friendly hand is spread out to them. I can see by my son's letters how grateful he and so many other boys are towards so much kindness.

On my part, I, the father of Private Vic. Glasser, now in the base hospital, am thanking you for providing him while ill, with so many home comforts.

I also am thankful to all tbe members of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith for the great interest they are taking in the Jewish boys at camp. I remain

Sincerely yours,
Mr. Chas. Glasser.

On Feb. 2, a member of the Order wrote the following letter to the editor of the Jewish Tribune:

Camp Kearney, Cal. Feb. 2, 1918

Editor Jewish Tribune:

Really and truly I can't express enough to tell you how I felt as a B. B. member in regard to the splendid work that the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League of the Independent Order of B'nai B'rith is doing here for our Jewish soldiers. Our camp is about 16 miles from San Diego. They are giving dances and entertainments every Saturday evening. The boys are all surely amusing themselves. They also provided a fine club room from which we could write, read and have an opportunity to get acquainted.

I will also write a few words for the ladies of San Diego who are working wonderfully in order to make our Jewish boys comfortable. We surely appreciate their kindness.

Cordially yours,
Abe Soss.

SKETCHES OF MODERN JEWISH HISTORY.

the congregation, managing its own affairs, and the "Tempel" was opened. This was, however, not enough for the advocates of the movement. They wanted an endorsement of the principles of the new congregation as in harmony with traditional Judaism in order that it may find imitators elsewhere. The deviation of the "Tempel" from tradition was only in one point dogmatic. Its revised prayerbook amended all passages in which the hope for Israel's national restoration was expressed, otherwise even in the points in which the views of the liberal element in Judaism had long ago gone beyond the old prayerbook, like the resurrection of the dead, the plenary inspiration of the Bible and the divine judgment on New Year and the Day of Atonement, the wording of the old prayerbook remained unchanged.

The points of departure from time-honored practice were four: The synagog was to open only on Sabbath for worship. Instrumental music was to be introduced, the prayers were said partly in the vernacular, and finally the already mentioned departure from the belief in Israel's restoration to Palestine was to be sanctioned. Jacobson offered liberal support, if these innovations would be sanctioned by rabbinic authority. He had not been cured of his belief in the revival of a Sanhedrin. The best instrument for the realization of this scheme was a Schnorrer who naturally knew all the prominent rabbis of Europe. This Schnorrer, Eliezer Libermann, obtained indeed, some indorsements. The only officiating rabbi who could be induced to indorse the innovations was Aaron Chorin (1766-1844), rabbi of Arad, in Hungary. Other indorsements were obtained from Moses Kunitzer, a rabbinical scholar, living in Altofen, and two entirely unknown prebendaries, living in Leghorn, where some wealthy Jews had left funds for the maintenance of rabbis. Libermann, himself a rabbinical scholar, wrote in the style made popular by Montesquieu, under the disguise of an oriental rabbi, traveling in Europe, who advised his brethren to adopt occidental methods in their worship instead of maintaining the customs of the orient.

The orthodox could not remain inactive. They published a collection of rabbinical opinions, proving that the changes, introduced in the Hamburg "Tempel" were tantamount to an abandonment of the fundamental principles of Judaism, and by numbers and authority they did prove their point. There was the dean of the German rabbinate Zalman Kohlen of Fuerth, then eighty years old, who bemoaned his fate that he was spared to such an old age to witness this sacrilege in Israel. There was the rabbinate of old historic Prague with Rabbi Eleazar Fleckles, the disciple, and Samuel Landau, the son of Ezekiel Landau, at the head. There was Moses Sofer, the most celebrated Talmudic scholar of the age with his father-in-law, Akiba Eger, the equally illustrious rabbi of Posen. There were some statements from various Italian rabbis, intending to prove that the opposition to reform was not confined to men without secular education. The effect was not decisive in either way. Those inclined towards modernism, like those opposed to it, had been convinced before. The whole question was one of aesthetic and political sentiment. Isaac Disraeli, the father of the famous statesman, when declining the office of president of the Portuguese congregation of London, said in 1813: "Your public worship, as now conducted, disturbs, instead of exciting religious emotions". We can easily understand that young men like Ignaz Moscheles and Meyerbeer, then already musical talents of first rank, would not be attracted by the music of the synagog as it existed then. Yet it is also true that Disraeli waited until the death of his father, of whom he was financially entirely dependent, before he had his children baptized.

As the cultured people felt repulsed by the aesthetically obnoxious form of the services, so the progressive minds felt out of touch with the fundamental idea, expressed in the prayers on all occasions that they must look forward to the time when the prophet Elijah would sound the shofar and call them together from all parts of the earth, miraculously gathering them in Palestine, where a lineal descendant of David would appear, the temple on Mount Moriah would be rebuilt, animal sacrifices would be offered every day by the descendants of Aaron and the dead would arise to new everlasting life. What the frivolous Schnorrer had said in Teplitz sixty years previously, what. at the time when a great part of Judaism was carried away by Sabbatai Zebi, the Messianic pretender of Smyrna, Spinoza must have felt in his lonely study, and taken a hold of practically the whole cultured element of the Jewish people, and the boldest among them demanded official recognition of their conviction. The masses loved their ancient religion, their time-honored practises too, and no consistory, though it had a seal, showing its authority came from Napoleon, could shake them in their conviction. Neither Aaron Chorin nor Moses Sofer could convince by their theological arguments those that had not been convinced before.

ARMAGEDDON.

pose, in God's world. A new dawn is breaking, the dawn of salvation. Israel's redemption is the earnest of the world's rehabilitation, that the earth may be a happier place for our children. For the day of the Lord begins with wrath and the clash of arms and the rage of mad kings and potentates; but it ends in salvation. And salvation must come for and through the Jew. "Nations were in tumult, kingdoms were moved; He uttered his voice, the earth melted. The Lord of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our high tower". God's voice is speaking through the battling armies, through Armageddon which is co-extensive with every front, in East and West, on land and on sea and beneath the foaming waters, aye, in the air; it speaks to us through utterances of statesmen, through the British Minister of Foreign Affairs, through the President of the United States, aye, through the inarticulate mutterings of Russian extremists; it speaks through the liberation of the Holy City from a hateful yoke; it speaks in every American home through privation and suffering and mourning. At the last it is heard by us, we comprehend its meaning. It thunders and roars about us, but at last we see the light piercing the clouds. "And there shall be one day which shall be known as the Lord's not day, and not night, but it shall come to pass, that at evening time there shall be light; and the Lord shall be King over all the earth; in that day shall the Lord be One, and His name One." Jewish monotheism, the devotion with singleness of purpose to the full meaning of the unity of God, to the exclusion of the idols which men have set up in their hearts, the idols of unrestrained selfishness and lust and greed, shall at the end be vindicated. The full Jewish truth must be acknowledged by mankind. And the Jewish truth can be safeguarded only by the Jewish people holding fast to the promises of old. To us it has been committed as a trust. And we shall remain its guardians not by disbanding, but by concentration, not by submersion in the raging waters, but holding our head high above them; not by bartering away our birthright for the comforts and conveniences of the hour, but if needs be by sacrificing the present that the future may be ours. The world is refurnishing its weapons, revising its new outworn philosophies, declaring its new aims. Let the Jew likewise stand ready to discard ephemeral doctrines made for a definite time which now is passing away. If you cling to Napoleonic ideas, you will be swept away with them. If you can adjust yourselves to conditions as they are arising, you will live on with them. Be not afraid of being charged with opportunism. It is not a chance idea that fascinates us. It is the ancient prophecies uttered in by-gone days in the fulness of Jewish conviction. Arise, and be Jews. Welcome the redemption of Israel. "Rejoice ye with Jerusalem, and be glad with her, all ye that love her." Rejoice in the day of the Lord; when the reign of peace of salvation will be ushered in, a reign without end. For it means the Kingdom of God against which the hosts at Armageddon have been battling in vain. It means the rehabilitation of humanity, the consecration of man for the works of peace and the service of the One God. "Happy is he that waiteth."

WORLD DEMOCRACY.

assert that the ideal nation is y[illegible] born, and indulge the hope that [illegible] where whether in that "promis[illegible]" or this one, at least on some [illegible] Jewish genius and altruism will [illegible] tribute to an establishment of the true Zionism, a safeguarded home sanctified by every vital doctrine which makes a nation truly great—not for Israel alone, but for the downtrodden and the heavy laden of every race and creed, a recognition and a vindication of our priestly mission—a re-establishment of God's kingdom upon earth.

Already the dream of today is becoming the truth of tomorrow. It is exemplified in the lives of individuals who are struggling to humanize the world. By studying the consciences of their fellow creatures they are placing man above the works of man. It is in the direction of the thought that civilization means mankind; that every man is mankind I am society. My neighbor is the world; and the mainspring of this mighty mechanism is that little flutter and flash of life, the human heart. We are constructing something lasting when we build upon the spirit and the faith that in the march of progress man is keeping step to the heartbeat of his fellowman.

There is a simple parable—a fugitive tale from the Midrash—that when God had created the heavens and the earth, the sea and all that in them is, he paused before creating man, lest one discordant tone might mar the harmony of his handiwork So while the morning stars sang together and the new-made nature reveling in her holiday attire quickened to the touch of this perfection, He summoned to His side His three trusty counsellors, the Archangels of Wisdom, Truth and Mercy. "Shall I make man"? He asked them. Make him not, O. God"! cried Wisdom. "He will trample on Thy laws"! "Make him not, O God"! added the voice of Truth. "He will defile Thy sanctuaries". But Mercy, kneeling before the Throne of Righteousness with streaming eyes, sobbed out, "Make him, O God, make him, and I will walk beside him in his dark hour".

So God made man; and said to him, "Thou art the child of Mercy! Go forth with thy mother and live with thy brother man"!

A THOUSAND YEAR OLD LETTER.

The March issue of the Jewish Forum contains an account of a recently discovered letter of the great Jewish philostopher, Saadya Gaon, who lived in the tenth century at Sura in Babylon. The discovery was made by Rabbi Dr. Bernard Revel, a great Jewish scholar who is dean of the Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary. This time-worn document was contained in a codex brought to this country from Morroco by Prof. N. Slousch.

According to Rabbi Revel, the letter was addressed to the Jewish communities of Spain and contains some points of practical advice which are just as pertinent in our generation as they were a thousands years ago. Saadya makes the interesting philosophic observation that the human soul cannot and will not be satisfied in this life even though it attain to world-dominion because it has an instinctive feeling of its destiny in a future life, where it will attain to complete harmony. Moreover, Saadya calls attention to the fact that the national ideal of the Jewish people is the study of its sacred lore—the Torah—whereas the ideals of the nations of the world are conquest and acquisition of wealth.

BEZALEL SCHOOL IS REOPENED.

The gladdening news comes from Palestine that with the entry of the British forces, normal activity in the Jewish colonies is resumed. The Provisional Zionist Committee has received the information that the shops of the Bezalel School are now open and work there is going on as in the days before the war. One week prior to the occupation by the British armies, Prof. Shatz and Mangaer Boroachov were expelled by the Turkish authorities.

ANTI-JEWISH RIOTS IN GALICIA.

Serious anti-Jewish riots have occurred in Cracow, Lemberg and other towns in Galicia, according to advices received by the Provisional Zionist Committee. Hundreds of men and women were seriously injured, and the rioters pillaged shops, stores and homes. Polish students were the ringleaders of the mobs, which were not interfered with by the authorities.

The rioting was fomented by the broadcast distribution of instigatory circulars and anti-Semitic leaflets, which were handed out even in the public schools, government buildings and railroad stations.

B'NAI B'RITH OF SEATTLE

At the February meeting of Rainier Lodge, No. 627, of Seattle, an entertainment was successfully carried out at the close of the business meeting.

Vice-president Meyer Cohen submitted a report regarding the dedication of the B'nai B'rith Club House for soldiers and sailors in Tacoma.

Following the report an address was delivered by Mr. S. Schwabacher on "Principle," which was enjoyed by all.

On March 6, 1918, Rainier Lodge, No. 627, held a get-together meeting which was largely attended. A musical program of varied numbers was successfully carried out and various talks were made by members of the lodge on the subject "The Jew as a Fighter." This was the first social meeting of the lodge for the year and served as a starter for the big membership drive that the lodge is planning for the spring.

The Menorah prize offered by Rainier Lodge, No. 627, is to be competed for by May 1. The committee of awards, of which Dr. S. Koch is chairman, announces that it will accept essays on the following subjects:

An Estimate of Prophecy, The Synagogue. Ceremonial in Judaism. Sects in Israel. The Significance of the B'nai B'rith. Jewish Immigration to the United States. His Faith. How to Maintain a Vigorous Communal Worship in Israel. How to Check Absorption? The Status of the Jews in War Zone After the War. The Moral Obligations of the Jewish American to his Co-Religionists in the War Zone.

Essays must not be more than 2,000 words in length, typewritten—Closing date May 1.

A picture of Earl Reading, Lord Chief Justice of England and English Ambassador to the United States, was given to the University of Washington Law School Library by Rainier Lodge. It is a rare print and bears an original autograph of the distinguished jurist and diplomat.

At the meeting of Rainier Lodge No. 627, held on Wednesday, Feb. 20, 1918, at the Educational Center, Bro. Sol Herzog delivered an address on the subject, 'Political Organization of the Ancient Jews".

RESOLUTIONS.

Resolutions of condolence adopted Feb. 17, 1918 by Chippewa Valley Lodge, No. 334, I. O. B. B., on the death of brother

Isaac Rothstein.

Whereas. On the twenty-first day of January, 1918, the spirit of life departed from the body of our late lamented brother, Isaac Rothstein, who was for many years up to the time of his decease a worthy and honored member of our Lodge.

Resolved. That in the death of our said brother, this Lodge has lost a valued member, whom we all learned to love and respect for his gentle and sterling qualities; his family, a good, and kind father; the community in which he lived and moved, a valuable citizen, pleasant and cheerful to meet.

Resolved. That this Lodge regards his death with profound sorrow, that the Charter of this Lodge be draped in mourning for a period of thirty days in testimony of our esteem for him, that a copy of these resolutions be spread upon and made a part of the records of this Lodge, that copies thereof be delivered to his wife and daughters at Los Angeles, Cal.; and to his son, Nathan G. Rothstein at New York City, and District Grand Lodge.

B'NAI B'RITH OF ST. PAUL., MINN.

Dr. Carol Aronovici, in charge of the Wilder Charities, spoke on "Housing Conditions in St. Paul," on Monday evening, Feb. 11, 1918, at the February meeting of Minnesota Lodge, No. 157. The talk was illustrated by lantern slides. There was also a musical program by Miss Evelyn Blehert and Mr. Samuel J. Jacob. The meeting was concluded by dancing.

A most artistic and varied program was arranged by the entertainment committee of the lodge for the Washington Birthday Celebration for the benefit of the B'nai B'rith Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare Fund, which celebration was held on Thursday evening, Feb. 21, 1918.

On Monday evening, March 11, 1918, Minnesota Lodge, No. 157, held an open meeting following a short business session. Dr. I. L. Rypins spoke on "My Views on Zionism." There was also a musical program followed by dancing.

MIAMI, ARIZONA

On Feb. 7, 1918, the members of the newly organized B'nai B'rith Lodge of Miami, Ariz., received official notice that a charter was granted to that organization. Bro. B. E. Marks of Phoenix, Ariz., was deputized by the District Grand Lodge to initiate the members and install the lodge. The lodge will start with a membership of 24. The following members were elected to office: W. Isber, President, A. Harris, Vice-President; L. Lieberman, Secretary; L. Kubelsky, Monitor; S. A. Simon, Assistant Monitor; F. Granich, Warden, and L. Adler, Guardian Trustees: N. L. Harris, Maurice Cohen, A. B. Miller.

An open meeting and entertainment was held by the members of the Lodge on Feb. 22, 1918, in honor of Sol Krupp, who has joined the U. S. Army.

In celebration of Washington's Birthday an appropriate program had been arranged, which consisted for the most part of patriotic addresses by members of the order. Complimentary remarks were made by the chairman of the occasion, after which the main address of the day was made by L. Lieberman. He chose as his topic the life of Washington.

Following the speeches a mock trial was held in which the defendant, Leslie Adler, was charged by Sol Krupp, with having stolen a shirt from the latter's store. The lodge hall was changed so that it represented a court room. The members present enjoyed very much the presentation of the case by the prosecutor and the defense prepared by counsel for the defendant. The evidence induced into the case was of such a nature that it resulted in the talismen failing to reach a verdict and the judge thereupon gave both Adler and Krupp half a shirt.

After the entertainment refreshments were served and a social hour was spent.

IRON RANGE LODGE, HIBBING, MINN.

A very successful meeting was held under the auspices of Iron Range Lodge, No. 793, at Hibbing, Minn., on Sunday, March 3, 1918. A class of five candidates was initiated and short talks for the good and welfare of the Order were made by a number of visiting brethren. In the evening a banquet was held in the public library at which about 150 persons were present. Prof. Herman L. Slobin of the University of Minnesota of Minneapolis, Minn., was the principal speaker. Other interesting talks were given by Bro. Hiram D. Frankel of St. Paul, vice-president of the District Grand Lodge, Rabbi Maurice Lefkovitz and Brothers M. S. Winthrop and S. Bublick of Duluth. Rabbi Pfeiffer of Virginia, Minn., and three non-Jews, Judge Brady and S. C. Scott, city attorney of Hibbing, and Prof. Mikesh, superintendent of the Junior College in Hibbing, all made short but interesting remarks.

Bro. Charles D. Oreckovsky acted as toastmaster.

All present who have lived on the range for years declared that this was the finest gathering of the Jewish people ever held on the range. The officers of the Northern Minnesota B'nai B'rith Council were congratulated on the result of their first effort.

EMES LODGE, SPRINGFIELD, ILL.

By D. Seligman.

Emes Lodge, No. 67, one of the oldest lodges in this district, is awakening. We have added a number of new members and expect to initiate a large class in the near future. Our meetings are held the first and third Wednesday evening in the vestry room of our new temple, of which we are all very proud. The Sisterhood meets on the same evenings and that is the reason we have large attendance. I am not surprised for the ladies certainly are a "drawing card." The following officers were elected for this term: Bro. Julius Myers, president; Bro. Rabbi Mortimer Bloom, vice-president; M. Eckstein, monitor; D. S. Benjamin, treasurer; Charles H. Seaman, financial secretary; D. Seligman, corresponding secretary, and Julius Samson, warden. Can you beat that? Our worthy brother, S. Benjamin, who has faithfully served this lodge as secretary for a great many years, declined re-election, but he still can be seen at every meeting. Bro. B. A. Lange, one of our most active members and once president of this district, is just as active and takes just as much interest for the good of the Order as he did forty years ago, and that is going some, don't you think? The ladies of the Sisterhood (God bless them), surprised us with an elegant lunch after one of our recent meetings which could not be beat. Come again ladies, more anon.

B'NAI B'RITH OF DENVER.

At the meeting of the lodge held on March 10, 1918, Bro. Dr Robert Levy spoke on the subject, "Physical Requirements of Aviators."

The entertainment committee of the lodge announces a dance on March 25 at the Progress Club. The committee's efforts to bring ripeness into the hearts of the members will no doubt be shown by a large attendance.

The Social Service Big Brother Committee is again arranging for Sunday services for the boys at the Industrial School at Golden. The Women's Jewish Council will prepare the meal.

At the last meeting of the lodge three candidates were initiated and seven applications were presented.

At the meeting of Denver Lodge, No. 171, of Denver, Colo., held on Feb. 10, 1918, a continuation of the series of talks on "Noted Jews of America" was held. "Mr. Louis D. Brandeis, Justice of the United States Supreme Court," was the subject discussed by Bro. Simon J. Heller.

During the month of February, the lodge inaugurated a campaign for additional members in accordance with the plan of the propaganda committee of the District Grand Lodge to increase the membership of the district to ten thousand.

The service flag for Denver Lodge was hung at the first meeting of January and contains twenty-one stars. Bro. A. F. Friedman on behalf of the trustees of the lodge gave a patriotic talk at the time of presentation.

The various standing committees of the lodge for the present year were appointed at the January meeting of the lodge.

HARMONY LODGE, BRIDGEPORT, CONNECTICUT.

Mr. Harry O. Sandberg, of Boston, delivered an address on "Jews of South America", under the auspices of Harmony Lodge No. 711 of Bridgeport, Conn., on Sunday, Feb. 7, 1918. Mr. Sandberg is an authority on the Jews of South and Latin America and his address proved of much interest to the large audience which was present. There was also an appropriate musical program and at the conclusion of the evening an informal reception was held in honor of the speaker.

It is expected that as a result of the membership drive inaugurated by the lodge the roster of the lodge will be considerably increased. The Horeb Lodge Degree team will be invited to exemplify the ritual.

Harmony Lodge has again been honored by the District in the person of Bro. Charles H. Shapiro who was elected First Vice President of the District Grand Lodge at its recent convention.

Harmony Lodge has appointed a committee to take charge of the sale of War Savings Stamps. At the recent meeting of the lodge more than $100 worth of such stamps were disposed of.

Harmony Lodge No. 711 of Bridgeport, Conn., held its annual Washington Birthday party for the young folks on the afternoon of Feb. 23, 1918. The lodge rooms were decorated with flags in honor of the day.

The committee of ladies in charge arranged a fine program of entertainers. After the fun, refreshments consisting of ice cream, candy and cakes were served. Then came the singing by all of patriotic songs and the party broke up late in the afternoon.

EAU CLAIRE, WISCONSIN.

On Sunday, March 3, 1918, Chippewa Valley Lodge No. 334 of Eau Claire, Wis., celebrated B'nai B'rith Day. Bro. Milton P. Firestone of St. Paul, was delegated by the Grand Lodge to pay the lodge an official visit and aid it in the B'nai B'rith Day celebration.

A meeting of the lodge was held in the afternoon, at which Bro. Firestone spoke to the members regarding the work of the Order. In the evening a banquet was held, which was attended by all the members of the Lodge and their families. A program consisting of musical and vocal numbers followed and at its close. Bro. Firestone delivered the principal address on the subject of "Patriotism and Loyalty". The festivities were brought to a close with a dance.

Bro. Firestone reports a great deal of interest manifested by the members of the lodge and that quite a number of members from surrounding smaller cities attended the celebration which was a joint affair, being the B'nai B'rith Day Celebration and Purim Festival. Bro. Firestone was well received by the members and was hospitably entertained durin his stay.

In the personage of soldier members, the B'nai B'rith was represented by almost every section of the country. The balance of the evening was pleasantly spent in stag fashion.

Cigars were provided through the courtesy of Mr. David Weiss, president of the United Cigar Stores Company of New York City.

KANSAS CITY LODGE, KANSAS CITY, MO.

The best cultural meeting ever held by Kansas City Lodge No. 7184 took place on Jan. 28, 1918. This was the sentiment expressed by the large attendance present on that occasion.

Judge Joseph Kiernan addressed the meeting, and delivered a most interesting talk on the vice conditions now existing in Kansas City and the ineffectual attempts to stamp them out. Mr. Albert A. Light at the piano, rendered several numbers with his usual excellence. Mr. Jack C. Reefer, chairman of the cultural committee, presided over the meeting. After the meeting a buffet luncheon was served.

An impressive memorial service was conducted at the meeting on Jan. 14. At this same meeting officers were installed and service work for many Jewish boys at Camp Funston was discussed.

The new administration is now well launched and the aims of its president bid well to be realized. Five hundred new members are to be obtained during the year and it is hoped that non-members will acquaint themselves with the purposes and results that are obtained by the many institutions maintained under the auspices of this Order. It is planned to present an interesting program, a smoker or an open meeting at least once each month.

MENORAH LODGE, BALTIMORE.

Menorah Lodge No. 77[illegible] is rapidly progressing both as to the membership and in the range of its activities. In addition to the active work it is undertaking with reference to welfare work for the Jewish soldiers and sailors by virtue of the fact of its close proximity to Camp Meade and to Annapolis, it has sufficient time to continue its activities otherwise.

For the present it is conducting a card party on the first Sundays and a musical on the third Sundays of the month, to which all the visiting soldiers and sailors are invited. Minstrel Show.

The military Minstrel given under the auspices of Ramah Lodge on Sunday evening, Feb. 24, 1918, at the Hotel La Salle, was an unqualified success. The committee felt regretful that it did not select a much larger place for the holding of the entertainment, as more than fifteen hundred people were turned away, owing to the fact that there was no more standing room even in the hall. The play entitled "Over There," was written and staged by Mr. Dave Wolff and the musical numbers were under the direction of Miss Elsa Meyerson. Some of the best amateur talent in the city appeared in the cast and in addition there was a chorus of thirty. Dancing followed the performance. The entire proceeds of this entertainment will be devoted to the B'nai B'rith Soldiers' and Sailors' Welfare League.

B'NAI B'RITH OF SAN FRANCISCO.

The social and entertainment given by Golden Gate Lodge No. 129 on Feb. 20, 1918, is beyond description insofar as its success is concerned. Following the entertainment Bro. Nathan Newmark made an interesting address in which he eulogized the sterling qualities and traits of George Washington, urging at the same time loyalty to our country in its present hour of need. In conclusion, he warmly advocated that membership in the Order was a synonym for loyalty to Judaism and good Americanism. MT. SINAI LODGE, NEW YORK.

Mt. Sinai No. 2. Bro. Edward Sander delivered an impressive address at the memorial service held in honor of our late Bro. Isidor Metzger, under the joint auspices of Bro. Metzger's Masonic Lodge, Mount Neboh and Mount Sinai, No. 2, I. O. B. B. Bro. Sander's earnest and eloquent address was greatly appreciated by the many brothers present. Bro. Metzger was secretary of Mount Sinai, No. 2, for upwards of 20 years, during which time he rendered valuable services not only to Mount Sinai, but to the Home for Aged at Yonkers and to the district generally. Though a member of many organizations, the I. O. B. B. was to him the inspiration of his life. He was a man of genuine benevolence. Shortly before he died, when his friends spoke to him of his many acts of benevolence, his characteristic remark was, "If I did practice any benevolence at all in my life, I was inspired to do so by the high and noble aims of the I. O. B. B. The Order has had more influence on my life thanany other institution or organization I know of".

NEW YORK ISAIAH LODGE.

CHARITY BALL BY HARMONY LODGE, BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

Once again has Harmony Lodge No 711 successfully concluded their annual Charity Ball, given at the Stratfield Hotel, Bridgeport, Conn., Feb. 12, 1918 As all the returns are not in, the exact amount realized is unknown, but judging from the large assemblage present, the affair was a huge financial as well as a social success. A good time was certainly enjoyed by all, and nothing but praise has come to Bro. Abraham Schneem, Chairmen of the Committee, ever since Lincoln's birthday.

A military atmosphere existed owing to the presence of a number of Naval Reserves stationed at Black Rock, attending in a body. Bro. Corporal David Saltman came from Camp Devens, and Bro. Benjamin Factor, made an especial trip for the affair from Washington, where he is a statistician in the government service.

The Harmony Lodge Charity Ball is an annual event given by the Lodge for the benefit of certain Ladies Jewish Charitable Societies of this city. This is one of the many things done by Harmony Lodge as its bit for the people of its community as a lodge of the I. O. B. B.

A great deal of credit is due Mrs. L. S. Kinkelstone, President of the Hebrew Children's Aid Society for her splendid support that helped to make the affair a success, as a large part of the proceeds already realized has been raised through her assistance. She also proved invaluable to Mrs. Benjamin W. Brownstein, Chairman of the Patronesses Committee, in securing a large number of patronesses for the affair. Valuable assistance in this work was rendered by Mrs. Abraham Zimmerman and Mrs. Charles H. Shapiro of the Council of Jewish Women.

Owing to the war, it had been impressed upon the members and the public by Chairman Jack Lederer of the Publicity Committee, that simplicity was desired and all elaborate features of other years were eliminated, the ball also being over at 12 P. M. in accordance with the local regulations of the Fuel Administrator. Nevertheless, the large number of pretty girls, the splendid music, the large congenial crowd, the exhibition dances kindly rendered by Miss Whanita Barker and partner during the intermission and the general feeling that all were contributing their bit in a worthy cause, all helped to make a splendid good time for every one present.

From a financial point of view, the Treasurer, Bernard Rubenstein and Secretary Joseph Solomon have already reported that receipts from the mailing list alone have considerably exceeded the estimated expenditures for the occasion. This has been especially pleasing to Bro. Lawrence S. Kinkelstone, President of the Lodge and Charles S. Shapiro, Past President of the Lodge and now Vice-President of the District No. 1, who rejoiced at the success of the ball due to the splendid efforts of the committee in charge.

THE WAY OF THE JEW.

"As rich as a Jew." That is a phrase—let's be honest—that is a sneer we have heard time and time again.

In all the history of the world—and we date that history since the destruction of the Temple—that taunt has never been true.

The Jew is a man of no possessions, except those of the spirit. The Jew is a man of no holdings in real estate and messuages and whatever else goes with the jargon of deeds—he might not hold them. The Jew might have the confidence of the King. True. He might likewise have his good word, his regal word—What was it worth?

It's hideous, an un-Christian story. But its true.

In these days we have changed all that.

In these days England, the aristocratic land par excellence, can think of no greater honor to pay the Great Republic of the West, that is saving her life, than to send her the Jew who is most representative, the Lord Chief Justice, Sir Rufus Isaacs, Earl Reading.

If we mention these things it is because Louisville is similarly situated. The war makes many calls. It makes many instant calls and demands. It has asked of Louisville institutions more than they could deliver—more help, more assistance, more resources.

And what do we find?

We find this simple statement:

The Jewish Hospital will be enabled to double its capacity through additions and extensions made possible by a gift of $100,000 from Isaac W. and Bernhard Bernheim.

That is all.

But it is noble, magnificent, princely.

Yes, and it is Jewish, too! Jewish because the hospital is for all; because the charity of the Jews forgets the covenant and embraces the world.—Louisville (Ky.) Herald.

"The Lamp Lighter"

Sermon Delivered by Rabbi Edgar F. Magnin of Los Angeles, Before the Grand Lodge, I. O. B. B. of District Number 4 on Friday Evening, February 15.

The lamp lighter went his rounds. Darkness and the dull, grey fog did not bother him. The fact that most men remained at home and hugged the comfort giving hearth fire did not even occur to him. His duty was to help pierce the fog, to scatter the darkness. That was all he knew. And so he trod thru the gloomy streets pole in hand, leaving a trail of glow behind him. And those few who walked the pavement on that dismal evening, because they had to, were thankful in their hearts that the lamp lighter had gone before them to shed light on the way.

Ah Israel, thou hast been a lamp lighter through the ages. Thou wast destined by God to pierce the gloom with shafts of gold. Thou it was whom He did command to be a light unto the nations of the world; to scatter the forces of Night and to sing the song of the Morning. Even as Jacob wrestled with the angel of the night, so hast thou been striving with the spirits of the dark. Israel, God has appointed thee to perform a great mission. "And in thy seed all the nations of the earth be blessed".

In the tabernacle of old was the Menorah, the seven branched candelabrum. Priests attended it. And it was fed with only the purest oil. This seven branched lamp was a symbol of all that was spiritual and lofty and pure. It typified order, plan, symmetry, holiness the light of truth, of justice and of mercy.

Think of what the Jew has given. A tiny people, materially never of great importance. Occupying a land no larger than the state of Massachusetts. Surrounded by pagans, whose religion was sexual degeneracy. This little people gave to the world its Bible and to the Christian world its saviour. This little people produced a Moses, first great democrat in history. He who struck the first note of human-liberty in defiance of the autocrat Pharaoh. Had we given the Ten Commandments, it would have been sufficient. Had we given the world a sabbath, it would have been sufficient. Had we written the Psalms, the inspiration of all great men and women thru history it would have been sufficient. But more than these have we given. Were not the prophets ours? The prophet of the exile, who saw in his visions and proclaimed the day of universal peace and brotherhood, of international justice and fairplay between the nations of the world, who spoke of a time when all would worship the common Father upon the common hill, was not he a Jew and did he not speak in Hebrew? The Hebrew that too many Jews know little of and care less about these times!

David Lubin has well said that this is a war between paganism and Judaism. Between the religion of the prophets and the gross materialism that strangles men's hearts and souls and makes them brutes and less than brutes. David Lubin has said, that all that the world hopes for today and is striving for and bleeding for and moving toward is to be found in the writings of Israel's seers. Who can with justice deny his contention?

Israel is the only nation in the world that has produced a school of prophets. Other peoples had their seers, great men of vision, spiritual giants, to be sure. But Israel had a school of prophets in the sense that other nations have had schools of poets, philosophers, artists, etc. Opposed to the professional priests, those who lived off the sacrifices brought to the Temple were those who for no material compensation sacrificed themselves upon the altar of service in the greater temple of humanity. Those men who denounced kings and potentates, the noble and the rabble, in behalf of the poor and the oppressed puzzle the student. Their particular form of genius is inexplicable. These men who took the old traditions that had come down to their day and reshaped them from a prophetic standpoint are incomparable. There were schools of them. They united to do God's work because they were called to do it. And no mortal in their day was too mighty to receive their rebuke in the name of the Lord.

And Mr. Lubin has well said that because Israel produced such men that it is for Israel to exemplify their teachings. He would have Israel lead the nations of the world for social righteousness and spirituality. The Jew has a sacred obligation. He who gave prophets must be the first to carry their message to the world. He whose people has read through the ages, "Blessed art Thou O, Lord, who hast chosen us from amongst all peoples and given us the Torah" must be the vanguard of those who carry the Torah in their arms and in their hearts. Yet is it not that way? Let us not deceive ourselves. If there be a reason for our indfference to our mission, that is one matter. But let us not babble doctrine and sound empty hollow expressions in the belief that the shadow is the substance. Let us be honest with ourselves at least and look the facts in the face. Let us do or undo, act or let alone, live that we might accomplish or blot ourselves out of existence once and for all. But let us not imagine that we are living for a purpose, whereas we have not the slightest interest in that purpose.

Israel has produced great men through the centuries, but for the most part, their contribution has been as individuals and not as a part of a great movement. Dreamers and workers have we had, but no new Bibles have we produced. Persecution warped our spirits and prosperity made us fat and complacement. No Bibles can be written in a Ghetto. Neither can a man be a prophet, while his eyes are focussed on profits. We have been between the devil and the deep blue sea.

Analyzing conditions briefly, it is easy to see why Israel has not been Israel; why the lamp lighter has paused in his labors. Under political and physical persecution, no people can come to its own. And emancipation and political equality also stood in the way of Israel's becoming a mighty spiritual power. The first burst of the dawn blinded the eyes of our people. The re-action from the Ghetto life was too strong. From the superstitious and narrow religion of the Ghetto they came to adopt the gods of materialism like the Philistines amongst whom they dwelt and dwell. The allurements of the Canaanitish faith and civilization are too many. Adjustments are difficult to make. They must come gradually and easily. It is not the fault of Israel that he has been made the martyr through the centuries. It is not the fault of Israel that with the first period of emancipation he should forget the God of his fathers.

Moreover, minorities suffer always. It is not easy to stand in the ranks of the few. The first tendency upon realizing that one belongs to a hated minority is to attempt to appear like the majority.

The thinker knows that the world moves on its axis by reason of minorities: that all the blows that have been struck for progress and all that is best in human development were given forth by the army of the few. It is the weak that have ultimately prevailed. The materially strong have never held their fortresses longer than a certain period. It is genius and spirit that conquer and geniuses do not grow like wild berries or acorns.

But how shall a people that has only known suffering and had little or no opportunity to obtain balanced opinion realize this? The average man believes that numbers count and majorities are right. He confuses the rights of the majority with the right of the majority. The first we grant. The second we deny.

Then again, Israel emancipated, had to take care of himself physically. Stomachs must be fed and bodies must be clothed. The first generation of freed men had to support themselves, their wives and their children. The struggle for existence is an inherent and a paramount instinct in human nature as it is through out all nature. The materialism of those about these ex-Ghettoists combined with a native shrewdness that only comes from practice in trying to avoid abuse and ruthless treatment made for a low standard amongst our people. So that in the clash of the every day battle and the endeavor to save one's skin, the soul was accounted for little or naught.

And yet, my friends, innate in the Jew is an idealism and a spirituality which can not be dwarfed. Suffering hath its blessings also. It makes one keen to distinguish between right and wrong. It sharpens the sensibilities and implants a real sense of justice and fairplay. Only he that has bent his back to the lash knows the sting and the wrong of causing men to suffer. This sympathy developed in the Jew by reason of all that he has gone through, combined with the high and lofty traditions that have come down to him from of yore, have prepared him to be a teacher to mankind. And he will some day be that teacher. Aye, in the veins of the Jew flows the blood of the prophets, apostles of justice, peace and liberty. That idealism only leaves the Jew when his veins are cut. It is in his blood and only when his blood is poured out does it depart from him.

Friends, I say unto you, that the test has not yet been made. A generation or two is not sufficient to make an accurate and scientific judgment. I say unto you that our people has forsaken its God, because the emancipation is something the like of which it has never quite experienced in the same degree before nor in exactly the same way. I have no objection to our people rebuilding Zion. Let those who will return to found a nation of the spirit and God bless them in their efforts, but I refuse to believe that Zionism is the only solution. I refuse to believe that the Jew under emancipation will fall to pieces entirely, commit suicide, trample upon all that is holy and beautiful that has come down to him. I say unto you that we are only in the first era of emancipation. Another generation or two under liberty and the Jewish people in the diaspora will come to its own. If Judaism can only live under persecution or isolated from all external culture, then I say, it can not contain anything uniquely good or beneficial that justifies its continuation. If Zionism will aid in maintaining Jewish culture and thought and furnish the environment for producing a purer Jewish contribution. then so much the better. It is certainly worth the experiment, to say the least. But I for one, refuse to believe that the Jew in countries where he enjoys rights, will be ultimately devoid of self respect and pride and loyalty and the consciousness of his mission. That the mission has been a failure in such lands up to date, I readily admit in view of the knowledge of the conditions which have made for such a result. But I am not pessimistic in my philosophy of Jewish history and do not believe that our only stimulous to spirituality is anti-semitism. I believe that a few generations from now, that the Jew in the diaspora, having under Providence enjoyed the opportunities for physical advantages and mental attainments will be truer to his faith than ever before and prouder than ever before. Two things, make individuals and nations good. One is chastisement and the other is education. If anti-semitism has made the Jew loyal to Ghetto Judaism, education and culture will make him the more loyal to prophetic Judaism. The Jewish mission is providential. And the Jew somehow will remain true to it. This I believe with every fibre of my being. The lamp lighter will go his rounds once again. Faster than ever. More eager than ever. And the light which he will shed will be brighter than ever. Friends, the Jew will write new Bibles, sing new psalms, proclaim new prophecies unto the nations of the world!

Meanwhile, the adjustment is difficult and a stormy period must be passed over. There are Red Seas to be crossed and deserts of preparation to be wandered through and you and I must be like unto Moses, and Aaron and Joshua, leaders of the people. We must help bring Israel to the promised land.

I consider my friends, the B'nai B'rith Lodge a real and tremendous factor in helping Israel to tide over this period of adjustment. I am of the belief that the Lodge has been, is and will be a valuable agency in giving Jacob the strength and the courage to go through the first unsettled periods of liberation. Even as Aaron and Hur upheld the hands of Moses during the battle with the Amalekites, so has the Lodge, so does the Lodge hold up the hands of Jewish leadership in its attempt to instill pride and loyalty into our people. If Israel is to be the lamp lighter unto the world, the Lodge has been in its turn a lamp lighter unto Israel. I consider the Lodge to be the expression and exemplification of all that is best and truest in Jewish thought. The Lodge is the great reminder to us of our mission. The Lodge, the seven branched candelabrum that reminds Israel that he has been chosen to spread light as a concerted people.

If the Jewish mission be to teach the one God and a common humanity, then the B'nai B'rith Lodge is helping to make the Jewish mission a reality. If the Jewish mission is to proclaim justice and mercy and fair play between nations and individuals, then is the B'nai B'rith Lodge reminding the Jew of his mission. If it be the duty of the Jewish people to live and not to die in order that it may give of the best that lies ingrained in it to the world, then is the B'nai B'rith Lodge an invaluable asset to the Jewish people and to the world.

Friends, outside of the Synagogue, there is no force in Jewry so spiritually potent as the Lodge. In small cities where there are neither synagogues or trained leaders, the Lodge becomes the synagogue and the leader and not for a particular class of Jews, but for all the Jews of the city. It was through the auspices of the Fresno Lodge that I first came into your midst and through its agency, it was they, not I, entrusted to found the first religious school for Jewish children in the city of Fresno, and after I was not longer able to come to you again regularly, it was the Lodge that maintained that school and continued it and encouraged its principle and teachers. I mention this example of B'nai B'rith work not to be personal, I assure you, but because, having been an intimate experience and one which is near to the local Lodge, it is the best and strongest illustration I can bring to you of only one of the many good things which the Lodge is doing.

Israel's mission is not an empty dream or a hollow, meaningless term. It is a reality, though the Jew just now does not realize it, but the Lodge is going to help him realize it and encourage

THE PHILOSOPHY OF A PROLETARIAN

Appeal to Our Brethren.

To my brethren I will come with a peaceful appeal: Is there a time when you think of closing your inner accounts? We ought not to lose so much time and energy in our party-battles which paralyze us so vehemently.

I opine that it is time we shall think about a truce and begin peace negotiations with all our war parties; we must find out the source of all our party contentions.

The first thing we must do is to look for it in the domain of religion.

The Stagnant Religious Center.

For a long time we have been thrust to the rear of the historical stage; our once lively people has been transformed into a religious sect, which had the task of maintaining nothing more than the soul; the body was lying in a trance.

Lately the historical force gave us a jolt and pushed us back into the living environment, signs of life began to show themselves, parties also formed themselves, which were forced to fight against the ancient traditions.

The dissatisfaction with religion comes from the pressure of life which has pushed us ahead; like a mighty stream it has destroyed all impediments that stood in its way.

It is a general phenomenon in every historical epoch, where the old generation clashes with the new; the conservatives wish to uphold the old order and the liberals are compelled to take everything by force.

In by-gone times this was an unavoidable conflict; the aim has really been attained long ago, one party is a conquered one and the other came out as victor; one should think that it is about time to meditate about peace, but the trouble is that the warriors carry a relentless hatred in their hearts, which has not been quenched up to this day; they see in religion the cause of all their misfortunes, the hatred blinds them.

They may have claims upon history, ich has condemned us to such a long m, the reign of religion is not the se but the effect of the people's sery.

Religion must be given credit; it has served us alive by rearing a protect- wall around us so that all the storms ll not be able to annihilate us; it has ered the diseased body with warm thing so that the fearful colds shall t have the power to freeze it to ith; it seems that we have no reason hate it, it should be enough for us that do not permit it to dominate over we are free men now.

But there is another trouble. The vly revived groupings are also not irely clean from lust for power and uvinism; in this I see signs of our old lady, which must be thoroughly cured. The religious party is the vanquished , we must let it rest.

We now come to the youthful group- s.

e Movable National and International Extremes.

will settle my accounts with the modern currents which oppose each er—the national and the international universal or progressive — radical ties—I think that both are in the right ce, but I will accentuate that both , not original and to some extent far ay from their source, it therefore goes wly.

First I will reckon with our national oupings. The truth is that they do clearly understand themselves; they e no positive ideas, no fixed plans; y are mostly driven by indefinite lings.

We want to be revived, but it is icult to accomplish, because we have discovered the right ways for it; must first come to an understanding out that which is transpiring in our np.

Why are the nationalists stormed so ch on all sides, mostly on the part the radicals? The religionists are werless, therefore their opposition is s active.

The radicals are particularly accused assimilation, such accusation cannot placed to the account of the religion- s; why, then, do both look upon as- ilation with repugnance?

think that there is a deeper ground this dissatisfaction; it very often pens that intelligent persons are lib- l to the whole world, but in their own mes they display great caprices; it nes from the fact that they have too icate a taste; in the outside world they erlook the mistakes, but in their homes y are very particular, they are too ich on the hunt for mistakes, nothing pleases them on account of their intelligence.

They notice how their youngster moves about with vivacity, they become excited, they cannot endure it because they are afraid he will grow wild and unruly, they have no time to attend to training, so all they do is, they give a beating, they strike right and left.

There is still a deeper psychological reason for it. Neither one of these parties can say with satisfaction of assimilation as Hannah, the wife of Elkanah, in the Biblical story, said of her son Samuel, "For this child I prayed," they see themselves disappointed in their hopes, they have higher aspirations.

The true religionists and the true free thinkers cannot be contented; they see in it a body without a soul. You may take notice of that.

I feel it on myself; I am for national activity, am for everything that has to do with strengthening and fostering of our people's body; but in regard to things of the soul, ideals, I am a great discriminator.

Let us take the idea of "egotism", it is justified in this particular case only, when it concerns bodily perceptions, egotism as an idea, as a moral conception cannot be approved of.

It is the same with nationalism, which is in reality nothing more than egotism in broader form, it is justifiable in one particular instance only; when it concerns the preservation of the body of the people, perhaps the preservation of the outward cultural form may also be added; things appertaining to the soul, to ideals, as a moral principle, as an abstract idea and deification, we cannot accept it. I see nothing original in this, it is a copy from the environment, "the Gods of the nations round about you", our people-soul does not tolerate idolworship.

We are in the position of God-seeking; we want to find our spirit, our power; we cannot accept strange copies, it may also be in the language of the Hebrews, the religionist will guard himself against wine of libation, it may even be in the Kiddush cup (used for a blessing on a holiday); the radical too cares more for the contents, the love for the language must not dazzle us; we will find our soul in our own source, we must be more original.

I am criticising the nationalists, I will also give them credit; they were the first doers, they went in advance; the course of evolution proceeds in this manner: At first one acts with mistakes, then comes the time of higher perfection, everything must be mended.

I see in this both the good and the bad side.

I can respect your endeavors, but your behavior cannot exculpate you. You boycott the movement while you are separated from it, you have pretensions that they are not doing it well.

But the question is, how can you expect that everything shall be in best order while the better parts are far from us; you should have understood it already that the body of our people cannot be killed and that especially the sprout possesses in itself enough vital strength and is able to grow and blossom.

Would it not be wiser for you to enter inside as an opposition and use your influence to bring about a better turn; you must recognize the fact that the position is critical, our young Judea alone cannot help himself, and you yourself would surely not advise him to depend upon a single party, is it then not your duty to come to his aid?

You must also know that the very fact that you find things that are bad is partly also your fault; if you would not stand at a distance it could possibly have a better appearance; now is the decided movement in which you come to help.

The others have a body without a soul, you have a spark of the Jewish soul, but it has transmigrated into other corporate bodies; you must come back to your people and help it not only to secure its goluth rights, but also its historical prerogatives.

The Original People-Psychology.

I am coming to the conclusion, we must seek out originality; the question is, how can we find it out clearly?

I come to our sages of the Torah and they show me a chest with books; old, also new Toroth; I have found out that this way is too long, also not safe enough; we can easily get lost in it, we can get drowned in an ocean of literature and philosophical systems.

I wish to extricate myself from entanglement, in this manner I want to find out a shorter way, also a safe one; I imagine we have lost all the books, a fire has destroyed them all, how will we then find our way out?

I think that our people in its entire extent is a living book, in which we can read a clear writing that will not confuse us.

The first thing we must do is to reckon with our people-psychology; here we must begin from our prehistoric times, from our forefathers, the patriarchs.

Our first ancestor represents in himself the religious idea, the second the descent and tradition, we can call them the national originals. The third, the most excellent of the patriarchs, our first fighter, has gained the rank of "Israel" through an ideal and economic combat; as you see, he was our first radical; our radicals of today must not feel insulted, the difference between the ancient and the modern ones consists in this only; our third forefather was united with the two previous ones, those of today are separated, torn apart, they are what we call in modern language "partial".

The same remark is also applicable to the other two groups, they are fragments, crumbled Jews, sunk too much in partiality.

This is really our goluth disease, here we must wrestle with the malakh hamaveth (the Angel of Death) who wants to strangle us and when we will master him we will have the right to call ourselves by the title of honor of our patriarchs, the immortal Israelites.

I will further remark, that the fundamental quality of our nationality, the divine idea of wenivrekhoo wekha kol mishpekhoth ha-adamah (in Thee all the families of the earth shall be blessed), that means the striving to serve as a blessing for all humanity, is just the opposite of chauvinism. Our nationalists should take notice of it, also our radicals should know that we have their universal strivings as a mistake inherited from our forefathers; when we will know our descent, we will also recognize ourselves.

JEWISH MEDICAL UNIT FOR PALESTINE.

Sanctioned by the United States and Great Britain, the American Zionist Medical Unit, with a personnel of 41, is making ready to leave New York City shortly enroute for Palestine, where it will co-operate with the Jewish Administrative Commission, which is laying the foundations for the future Jewish state in the Holy Land.

This unit is being equipped by Hadassah, the Women's Branch of the Zionist Movement at a cost of $250,000 to cover its first year's operations. It will include besides a general director and representative of the organization, a medical director, 15 physicians, 15 nurses, a sanitarian, two mechanics, two pharmacists and a dental staff. The physicians include specialists in surgery, eye, ear, nose and throat diseases, skin diseases and children's diseases. A hospital in Jerusalem has already been placed at the disposal of the unit, and the staff will be amplified from among the physicians residing in Palestine. In addition to the hospital in Jerusalem the unit plans to open a dispensary, engage in school-nursing and will operate several floating hospitals. It is carrying with it $40,000 worth of medical supplies, a complete equipment of surgical, dental, and radiograph instruments.

Together with the medical unit Hadassah will dispatch to Palestine over 70 huge cases of garments for the impoverished residents of that country. These garments were sewed or collected by the Hadassah chapters all over the United States. The "drive" for garments is still going on and additional supplies will be shipped later.

The money for the unit was raised in the following manner: $120,000 from the Provisional Zionist Committee, $100,000 from the Joint Distribution Committee and $30,000 from individual contributors. Two tons of soap were contributed by Mrs. Mary Fels.

THE ELECTION TO THE JEWISH CONGRESS IN RUSSIA.

The Jewish Press Bureau in Stockholm received the following telegraphic communication from Petrograd:

The elections to the Jewish Congress in Russia have been postponed for a fortnight in the whole of the Ukraine and in the Petrograd and Minsk districts.

A DIAMOND JUBILEE.

Seventy-five thriving years full of service to Judaism has been the portion of the Independent Order of B'nai Brith, and hardly a writer throughout the country can be found but credits this oldest Jewish fraternal order in the world, on the occasion of its seventy-fifth birthday anniversary just celebrated, with having been a great power for good in the past and having unlimited possibilities for the good of Israel in the future.

"It is no small or isolated holiday, today's seventy-five year jubilee of the Independent Order B'nai Brith", declares the New York Warheit. "It is a great event. It is a holiday for all Jews. And the Jews of the whole world, and of America in particular, would surely be celebrating with appropriate ceremonies, were it not for the straits in which the whole world, and especially the Jewish world, finds itself".

Discussing its early history and significance, the Chicago Jewish Record says:

"When the first lodge of the Order was founded it was entirely for welfare purposes in its own local Jewish circles; to help the needy and provide for widows and orphans. It was the first Jewish lodge, the first Jewish society of this kind in America. The Order spread rapidly over the whole United States. . . . Later, many district lodges of the B'nai Brith were established in Europe, in Berlin, in London, Denmark, Switzerland, Rumania, the Balkans, and otherwheres.

"The activity of the B'nai Brith then assumed a more general character of world activity, which, however, did not lose its philanthropic meaning. The B'nai Brith Order has been chiefly an organization especially for Jewish welfare. In this direction the Order achieved very much for American Judaism, to say nothing of its having served as a noble example for the other Jewish organizations of America which came after it, and copied it more or less".

The Warheit also looks back to Judaism in America in 1843, and remarks:

"Even then American Jewry was divided in the matter of religion, disunited in regard to poltics. The founders therefore saw it necessary to exclude religion and politics from the Order's platform. They therefore made as their principal basis charity, a broad Judaic education, and the struggle for Jewish rights. In all these three fields the Order has earned great merits. Its charitable institutions, as hospitals, orphanages, and general Jewish Red Cross work, are well known; its broad Jewish educational work, as the foundation of a Jewish library and editing of a number of journals are certainly not without importance; and with its struggle for Jewish rights, it has assured itself a place in Jewish history.

A Uniting Point.

"Even Zionists and radicals would have been able to be represented by it for general Jewish purposes", this organ thinks, and now, that various elements of the Jewish people seem to be approaching ever nearer unity and understanding, "such a completed organization as the B'nai Brith may sometimes serve as a uniting point much better than the new agencies which still are to be created for such a purpose."

JEWISH DIGEST,
Cleveland, O.

THE SPANISH JEWISH GIFT TO THE BRITISH RED CROSS.

The Lord Mayor of London has received an interesting communication from Dr. A. S. Yehuda, Professor of Semitics at the University of Madrid, enclosing a contribution from the Jews of Madrid to London Branch of British Red Cross. Dr. Yehuda refers to the prominent part taken by London Territorials and Yeomanry in the liberation of the Holy Land. He congratulates them on their good fortune and privilege to be among the foremost to enter the gates of conquered Jerusalem. They had aroused "everywhere in Jewry the greatest admiration for the citizens of the metropolis of the British Empire, who have shown that they are able to fight for the right and liberty of small and feeble nations with the same mettle and generosity as they displayed in peace time."

The contributors consist of Jewish subjects of allied and neutral countries living in Madrid, and Prof. Yehuda states that "the victory of His Majesty's forces in Palestine has been received with joy and satisfaction by neutrals also, who have the greatest confidence in the English colors flying over the Tower of the City of David."

FINNISH JEWS EMANCIPATED.

The bill granting full civil and political rights to the Jews in Finland has at last become a law. The struggle for these rights was long and tireless.

Sketches of Modern Jewish History

By Gotthard Deutsch

VIII.

If we analyze our interest in historic novels we will find that its psychological root is the romantic emotion which makes us admire the consistency of people clinging to ideals of the past. There is as much pathetic as humorous sentiment in the profound admiration that we still have for Don Quixote. From the same viewpoint I confess my great interest in the rabbinical literature of the first half of the nineteenth century. We see in its representatives men who are determined not to yield an iota of the ideal of their youth, and no matter how strongly we are convinced that these ideals are obsolete, we are bound to admire them. It is the same old story that we find expressed in Cain and Abel. Abel is the representative of the beauty and the romance of nomadic life. Cain again stands for agriculture, which is a progress towards a higher civilization. The progress is necessary, but it has its pathetic element. The Indian and the buffalo herds roaming through a vast country are still a much admired topic of fiction and the moving picture theater. We would not give up our cities with their comfort, our factories, mines and railroads, but it is a beautiful dream to place ourselves back into that period of primitive life.

From this point of view we regard the romance in the mental attitude of the men who stood by that Judaism, which knew of no conflict between the belief of the synagogue, and the practice of the home, whose whole life was governed by the ideals of old rabbinic literature, and who found all their ambitions realized in the religious atmosphere of the Kehillah, bitterly fighting against the cruel realistic conception of life as presented by the school of Mendelssohn. The most prominent of the rabbinic authors of this period, coeval with Mendelssohn's disciples, of whom I would mention as typical the otherwise mediocre Philistine and self-seeker, Herz Homberg (1759-1841), is Moses Sofer, or with his official name, Schreiber, born in 1762 in Frankfurt-am-Main, and rabbi of Presburg from 1807 to 1839. As principal of a Yeshibah which was frequented annually by hundreds of students, and as a prolific writer, he exercised the widest influence on his contemporaries, and is responsible for the maintenance of the Yeshibah system in a city which is only sixty miles distant from Vienna.

It is exceedingly difficult to present the literary type of a rabbinic author. To the outsider, who has not specialized in the history of this literature, it looks all alike from its beginnings in the Mishnah down to the works of the present-day rabbis, living in the Orient, in Poland and Hungary. Yet there is a great difference even between Moses Sofer, opposing modern culture right next door, and a contemporary rabbi of Bagdad or Smyrna, who knows of the conflicts between his age and the past no more than a ruler of Tibet knows of the labor problem, or of the freedom of the press. Moses Sofer's principles are tersely expressed in a pun, of which he is quite a master, on a rabbinical law. He says every innovation is contrary to religion. We find the same idea presented in other religions. Roman Catholicism, which does not allow its priests to grow beards, or the Protestant Bible, which uses "which" in the place of "who," as in "Our Father which art in Heaven," and preserves many other archaic forms of language, are based on the same principle. The character of Moses Sofer's theology is most evident in the discussion of such questions, which are presented by the exigencies of modern life. A woman whose Jewish name was Leviah (Hebrew for lioness, but perhaps the Latin "Livia") was to be divorced. The question of the orthography of names in the bill of divorcement (Get) is always an important subject in rabbinic discussions. In the first half of the nineteenth century the custom of adopting non-Jewish names spread with constantly increasing frequency. Leviah had called herself Lina, and the question arises whether this name, by which the woman was known, should be included in the Get. Moses Sofer, in discussing the question, speaks of "the foolish practice of Jews who adopt names in order to be like the Goyim." Other difficulties arise from the interference of governments with Jewish practices. It had been a general custom amongst Jews to bury their dead on the day of the death, considering a delay a sign of disrespect to the departed. Moses Sofer evidently feels that it is impossible to antagonize the government on this point. He insists, however, that the Jews must only yield to force because, while the reason for the government's order is to avoid the possibility that people be buried alive, he declares that if such a thing were possible, the authorities of the Talmud, who knew more of all human sciences than all the universities of the present combined, would have mentioned it. Another interference with internal Jewish affairs was the regulation of Jewish instruction. The paternal government of Austria demanded that every Jewish child receive instruction in catechism. Moses Sofer is strongly opposed to it. There is no such thing, he declares, as a fundamental dogma in Judaism. He condemns even Maimonides for laying down thirteen articles of faith. There is no such thing as a non-essential dogma, for if one denies that Bileam's ass spoke, he denies a fact which is related in the Torah, and with it he denies the inerrency of the Bible. Still another difficulty arose from the abolition of rabbinic jurisdiction. Up to the end of the eighteenth century the civil law of the Jews was that of the Talmud, and the rabbi was a judge. Since that time all the governments of western Europe subjected the Jews to the law of the land. One of the consequences was that the rabbis lost the power, granted to them under the former law, to use the weapon of excommunication (Herem). One use of the Herem was the protection of the copyright of Hebrew books. The government of Austria, being strongly protectionist, gave to a Christian printing firm of Vienna, Anton von Schmid, the privilege of establishing a Hebrew printing press, with the purpose of publishing the books needed for religious worship, which were imported from foreign countries. In 1803 Wolf Heidenheim, in Roedelheim, near Frankfort (1757-1832), a personal friend of Moses Sofer, had edited the various prayer books with a German translation, the Hebrew commentary. These editions, vastly superior to those used formerly, became very popular, and Anton von Schmid reprinted them, regardless of the copyright, protected by the Herem of the most prominent rabbis of Germany. Mordecai Benet (1753-1829), Landrabbiner of Moravia, like Moses Sofer, a determined opponent of all innovations, winked at this violation of the rabbinic law. He declared that inasmuch as a Herem is prohibited by the government, and inasmuch as Christian publishers are not subject to it, even the Jews do not have to respect it. Moses Sofer contends properly that while the rabbinic law cannot be enforced, there is no reason why a Jew should violate it.

The most important problem was created by the law issued for Austria in 1788, which subjected Jews to military service. There was no universal draft, but every community had to send its quota to be selected from the young men of draft age. Moses Sofer appreciates the delicacy of the situation. In such matter, he says, using a Talmudic phrase: "Silence is preferable to speaking." He strongly condemns, however, the practice of drafting poor fellows, on the ground that they are bad characters, or impressing them in the service when they have been found without a proper passport, for we have no right to declare that even a wild young man may be compelled to disregard the Jewish law. On the other hand, those who offer themselves voluntarily for such service, although they are doing wrong, may be accepted inasmuch as the quota has to be furnished, and if one congregation would not accept them, they would sell themselves elsewhere.

In the rabbinical literature of this, as well as previous periods, the Responsa dealing with actual law cases are from a historic point the most interesting specimens and lend themselves more readily to popular presentation. It is more difficult to give a picture of the law literature and the sermon. Yet an attempt shall be made. One of the typical representatives of rabbinic legalism at this period is Abraham Danziger of Wilna (1748-1820), the author of two popular Compendiums of Rabbinic law called "Hayye Adam" and "Hokmat Adam". The Schulhan Aruk, up to that time the most popular compendium of rabbinic law, first published in 1564, had been commented on by every rabbinic generation for the last two centuries. The editions became more and more unsightly and complex by the numerous glosses which surrounded the text. Abraham Danziger conceived the idea of making a digest of the most popular glossaries of the Schulhan Aruk and presenting the laws which were most needed in a revised form. While realizing the difficulty of making this system intelligible to a general public, I shall make one attempt. A law which practically has become abolished even in orthodox circles, is the prohibition of using bread baked by Gentiles. The Talmud gives it as a resolution passed by a rabbinic convention of the second century and intended to check social intercourse between Jews and non-Jews as leading to intermarriage. The prohibition is indeed older, for it is already mentioned in the Book of Daniel, and therefore existed already in the Maccabaean period. Practical consideration here, as in other cases, worked as the strongest force for liberalism. People simply disregarded the law, and rabbinic authors had to find an excuse for an actual condition which they were unable to change. They declared that the prohibition did not include the bread sold in baker shops, because this does not lead to social intercourse. This view is laid down in the Schulhan Aruk. Shabbetai Kohen of Wilna, who lived in the seventeenth century in a Catholic country, adds the remark that while the law was intended to prevent intermarriage, it applies to all social intercourse, and therefore a Jew must not eat bread in the house of a priest, although the Catholic priests have no families. The Schulhan Aruk recorded the law that in places where there is a Jewish baker the Jews should not buy bread from a non-Jew unless the bread of the latter is superior. Shabbetai Kohen adds the remark that it is better at all events to abstain from the bread of Gentiles, even in such a case. He also declares that a Jew must not eat the bread of a Gentile baker when he sits at the latter's family table, but on the other hand he may buy bread from a Gentile family which does not conduct a regular bakefy. Notes like this were embodied into the text of the Schulhan Aruk by Abraham Danziger, and his book, therefore became quite popular, although the rabbis of that time denounced it, as the contemporaries of Joseph Caro, the author of the Schulhan Aruk, had condemned his book and as all professional scholars condemn similar popular works as an encouragement given to superficiality.

Another specimen shall be quoted because it brings out prominently the change of time within the three generations of the nineteenth century. Samuel Loew (1724-1806), who was born in Kolin, Bohemia, and died in Boskowitz, Moravia, where he spent most of his life, is an interesting character. He never occupied a rabbinic position, and is said to have refused to enter the rabbinate on the ground of religious scruples. He was, however, a great rabbinic scholar, and his notes on the Schulhan Aruk, modestly called "A Half Schekel," partly to signify that in writing this work he merely did his duty as a Jew, just as in olden times every Jew had to pay a half Schekel as dues to the Temple of Jerusalem, and partly as a pun on his name, became very popular. Again I must plead for the indulgence of the reader in presenting a specimen of this work. The Schulhan Aruk notes the prohibition against marriage during the week intervening between Passover and Pentecost. At the same time it makes an exception with engagements which are permitted and declares that, if one married contrary to the law, he should not be punished because marriage is after all a "Mizwah". Samuel Loew adds the note that this exception from the discipline of the synagogue refers only to the transgression of the marriage prohibition, but not to that of shaving, which is also prohibited during this season as a sign of mourning based on the report that an epidemic carried off the numerous disciples of Rabbi Akiba at that period. Neither Kolin nor Boskowitz, the latter now a very insignificant congregation, has any rabbinical scholars amongst its laymen today. Rabbi Samuel Loew's family, of whom I know personally quite a number, has probably become quite modernized by this time. I remember a great grandson of his named for him who was a very old man, when I was living in Bruenn, thirtyodd years ago. He was proud of the fact that he was the first child named for this ancestor, but he was quite a liberal in religion and drove to the synagogue on Sabbath in his carriage when he had Jahrzeit. A great granddaughter, Babette Loew, became the wife of the dermatologist, Hermann von Zeissl, the first Jew who was regular professor at the University of Vienna. A great great grandson, named Max Loew, a lawyer of Vienna, became a convert to Christianity and was the attorney for some of the leading antisemites of Vienna, and as such defended the antisemitic priest, Father Deckert, who was indicted in 1891 for malicious libel committed by the publication of a ritual murder story.

As a similar specimen, I would quote Rabbi Samuel Falkenfeld, of Posen, who occupied the rabbinic see of this important community from 1802-1806, succeeding his brother, Joseph, who was the son-in-law of Ezekiel Landau, of Prague. Samuel Falkenfeld was opposed at the time of his election by the liberal element of the community, who petitioned the government to veto the election of this man as an obscurantist, who had pronounced a ban against a man for having an atlas in his possession. He nevertheless was elected and held his office until his death, being succeeded by an equally strong adherent of past ideals, Akiba Eger (1761-1837), the father-in-law of Moses Sofer. Falkenfeld complained that he had already difficulties when rabbi of Tarnopol, one of the earliest centers of modern culture in Galicia. Even there people began to drift away from Talmudism in the latter part of the eighteenth century. A daughter of Samuel Falkenfeld married a man named Isaac Braunstein of Galicia, who became quite wealthy, acquired a landed estate in Zaleszycki, and was ennobled as Baron von Brunecki after his conversion to Roman Catholicism. His wife remained a Jewess, but his children were raised as Roman Catholics, and a grandson of his, Dr. Bilinski, was a few years ago Austrian minister of finance.

In order to close with a more pleasant recollection, I would quote the case of aother prominent representative of rabbinism at that period, Moses Teitelbaum, who died in 1841 as rabbi of Satoralja Ujhely in Hungary. He was a native of Galicia and was a pioneer of Hasidism in northern Hungary, where his descendants are today known as the leaders of extreme orthodoxy, a great grandson of his, Abraham Teitelbaum, having died in 1904. Moses Teitelbaum was too eccentric even for his contemporary, Moses Sofer. He introduced in his congregation the Sefardic ritual, which was favored by the mystics, and demanded that the leader in prayer should always dress in white linen because his function was like that of a priest in the Temple of Jerusalem. Moses Sofer condemns these eccentricities in a mild way. To him the ideal of Jewish piety was compliance with the rabbinic law. For emotional mysticism he had no sympathy. Yet even Moses Teitelbaum had occasion to oppose modernism in his community. Raphael Kestenbaum, an old bachelor, and quite wealthy, left what was for his day a large fortune as a trust fund for the establishment of a secular school. The story goes that before his death the rabbi called on him in order to change his plans. "Reb Rephoel," he said, "we are all mortal, and while you may live hundred and twenty years, as I wish, you ought to think of what is to become of your money after your death." Reb Rephoel smiled, "Yes, Rebbe," he said, "I have thought of this many a time." "Nu," said the rabbi, "what are you going to do with your money?" "I shall invest it," was the reply. "And what is to become of the interest"? asked the rabbi. "It shall be aded to the capital", said Rephoel. "Nu, and what then"? asked the rabbi. "Then", said Rephoel, "there will be more capital". "And at the end"? asked the rabbi again. "At the end, Rebbe, the Messiah will come and you know that the dead will arise, and I shall have the whole capital with compound interest"

The school established by Raphael Kestenbaum is still in existence and, let us hope, he enjoys the compound interest in heaven.

GREEK GOVERNMENT AND TURKISH JEWS.

The Greek cabinet has decided not to apply to Jews in Greece who are Ottoman subjects the regulations prohibiting commercial transactions with subjects of enemy states. The advantages that will ensue to the foreign subjects referred to are the payment by fire insurance companies of moneys due to them on account of the recent conflagration, removal of their names from the black lists and annulment of decrees for the seizure of their immovable property.

Psychology of the Eastern European Jews

By Nachum Goldmann

Translated for the B'nai B'rith News by J. H.

Unless all indications prove deceptive, the termination of the present war will mark the opening of a new era in the history of the Jews of Eastern Europe. The entrance of Poland into closer relations with the culture and civilization of Central Europe is bound to subject the Jews of Eastern Europe to the same transformation of conditions which the Jews of Western Europe had experienced during the earlier decades of the last century. That transformation was caused by the emancipation of the Jews throughout the Western states of Europe and it caused the transition from the peculiar civilization, separated by the Ghetto walls from outside contact, into the general circles of modern European culture. This transition will be of the greatest importance, not only for the Jews of Eastern Europe themselves, but also for all of Central and Western European peoples. It hardly seems necessary to remind of the importance and the influence the Jews have gained during the century which has elapsed since their emancipation within all the Central and Western states of Europe in order to surmise what effect the sudden injection of those millions of Polish Jews into the social, economic and political life of all of Europe may have. For this reason it becomes the duty of all of those, who may be charged with the reconstruction after the war and with the establishing of stable conditions for the future, to become thoroughly familiar with and to understand the character and the psychology of the Jews of the Eastern zones of Europe.

Up to the present there exists nowhere any trace of even a superficial understanding by the larger elements of the peoples of these unfortunate Jews of the Slavonic countries. In the numerous publications on the question of the Eastern European Jews issued up to the present time, these Jews are referred to only in terms of contempt or fear, though sometimes these expressions are modified by words of pity. By the [illegible] Eastern [illegible] on as a [illegible] not to be [illegible] been any [illegible] nted with [illegible] g of the [illegible] Eastern [illegible] a world [illegible] ought altogether at variance from that prevailing in the other parts of the world and separated from it as if by an abyss impossible of access. His traditions, his customs and manners, the very roots of his being are derived from spheres that have but little in common with the origins of those currents within the circles of Western civilization. Where have we met the Jew from Eastern Europe up to the present time? Only as beggars and peddlers in the dirty suburban streets, as immigrants in the waiting rooms of railroad stations or as claimants for charity in the offices of the numerous institutions. I have seen letters from the camps of Poland written by Jewish soldiers, in many instances even by those of Zionistic affiliation, who certainly would be inclined to judge kindly and leniently, all of which letters spoke with contempt and loathing of the Polish Jews. For this reason it would not seem superfluous to attempt here to interpret the character and the sentiments of the Eastern Jew.

In its psychological essence the Eastern Jewry belongs to the category of the Ghetto-Jewry; this means that category of Judaism, which, robbed and deprived of its own land and its independence, still continues its existence as a nation within other nations; a people, dispersed among all the nations, which perseveres in living among them as a separate body, removed from the outer world by the—formerly concrete—but now only psychical and sentimental walls of its Ghetto. It is only by considering the Jew from Eastern Europe from this viewpoint and as the product of the Ghetto restriction that a correct analysis of his psychology becomes feasible. For this reason such Eastern Jews, who may already have escaped from the Ghetto and who have adapted themselves to the customs of modern civilization, must be excluded from the scope of this article. Their psychology is of too complicated a structure for proper consideration within the limits of discussion in a periodical. Furthermore, they are only a fragmental minority in comparison with the great masses of the Eastern Jews.

All attempts to arrive at an understanding of the characteristics of the Eastern Jew must proceed from a fundamental fact, of which most of his critics are completely ignorant; this fact consists of the discord existing between the several spheres of existence within which he lives. The key to a comprehension of this peculiar fundamental fact dominating his soul life is furnished by the cognition of the lack of all consciousness of feeling at home in the native land within the mind of the Ghetto-Jew. For this existence of his soul sentiments every human being requires such consciousness of being rooted in his surroundings, in the soil, in the land wherein he lives and to which he devotes his activities. A human being who lacks this consciousness of home feeling is like an unrooted plant. In most instances we are animated by this sentiment of being an organic part and parcel of our surroundings by education, reminiscence and tradition, which unite us to the land wherein we live. The Eastern Jew cannot have this consciousness of feeling at home. For he is barred from participating in the life and the activities of the community of which he should be a part. He is separated from the peoples among whom he lives by race, natural aptitude, culture, religion and conditions of life. He is bound to feel himself estranged from his surroundings, as having been stranded in that particular locality by the merest accident. That consciousness is expressed by his appearance and by his sorry figure of an Ahasver.

It would seem evident that under such conditions no human fellowship can permanently endure. An individual may possibly survive and become a Bohemian or a tramp. But a people of Bohemians cannot exist. Therefore, the Ghetto-Jew was compelled through the instinct of self-preservation to create for himself another center wherein he could feel himself at home wherein he might take root to take the place of that outward world wherein he was prohibited from participating. This other center he established by means of his religion. That religion was its own and only possession which the Jewish people had been permitted to carry from the home land into the exile and the dispersion. It must be remembered that the Jewish religion at all times was much more than mere ceremony or religious worship and that it embraced the entire system of Jewish life and civilization. Thus the Ghetto-Jew created for himself through the aid of his religion, besides an outward world, a psychical and sentimental center including all the elements of his religion, his traditions and his ultimate hopes for better days. As he was prevented from taking root in the soil he allowed those roots to tend upwards towards the intellectual life. In speaking of the religion of the Ghetto-Jew there must not be any conception of religion such as influences the normal inhabitant of Europe. To the Ghetto-Jew religion is the means of gratifying deeply felt metaphysical exigencies. To him the religion is his daily bread. Many of us might very well dispense with all religion, but the Ghetto-Jew could not get along without it.

From this can be drawn a very decisive conclusion, which is essential in order to arrive at a correct appreciation of the characteristics of the Eastern Jew; this is, that he leads two materially differing sorts of existence within the two distinct spheres of life. He is himself only within his own psychical-sentimental world. There alone he can be seen in his true colors. In the outer world, wherein he has to earn his living he is of inferior value, as he lacks assurance and all self-consciousness. This furnishes the explanation why the same Jew, who would heroically suffer martyrdom and even unflinchingly face death at the stake for the sake of his religion, in his intercourse with the non-Jew would daily permit himself to be trampled upon, to be insulted and disgraced without resentment.

In close connection with this fundamental fact the Eastern Jew possesses one quality, which has brought him many reproaches and rebukes; this is his apparently but poorly developed sense of honor and pride. Surely the quality which is the most offensive to the Western European is that servility, the cringing attitude, the callousness with which he pockets insults and derision.

Under the term of honor we include two distinct but widely separated meanings; the one is the subjective sense of honor which denotes the individual appreciation of the self and that is altogether independent of the opinion of others. This kind of sense of honor may be possessed even by the most unscrupulous in his dealings with his fellowmen. In speaking of the lack of the sense of honor by the Eastern Jew, there is no reference to this kind of subjective sentiment, but to the social sense of honor required in the intercourse between man and his fellowmen. This social sense of honor, however, demands as a prerequisite that some sort of equality exists between the several members of the community, whose intercourse it is to regulate. All the members of such community, regardless of rank or station, must consider themselves and all others to a certain extent and in a general principle to be equals. Between men who have no common fundamental interests, who do not recognize the equality of all others, there cannot exist this sentiment of social honor in the intercourse with one another.

Once this be fully understood it must become evident that the Eastern Jew cannot be imbued by this strong sense of social honor in his intercourse with the non-Jew, as the chasm separating the two is too profound. This statement may shock many sensitive persons and it may seem harsh, but at the present time when the full and true understanding of the characteristics of the Eastern Jew is essential, it becomes imperative to speak plainly and without reserve about the mental attitude of the Jew towards the non-Jew. It must be emphasized that the sentiment dominant in the Ghetto above all others is that of dread of the non-Jew. To the Ghetto-Jew the non-Jew is always the powerful, cruel persecutor, against whose malice, insults and persecutions there can be neither resistance nor resentment. Therefore, it would be advisable to avoid all intercourse with the non-Jew and where this be impossible to humble one's self before him.

To this is added a motive impelling towards the same result. While on the one hand, on account of his fears, the Ghetto-Jew in his social self-consciousness ranks so far below the level of the non-Jew as to be unable to display a strong sentiment of honor towards the latter, on the other, through his own peculiar sense of pride he considers himself to be far superior to the non-Jew and that sentiment makes the development of such sense of honor absolutely impossible. This sense of pride is the reaction of his fears. It must be plain that no community of interests can exist when the one part of the population is under a constant dread, when it always is obsessed by the consciousness of being the unprotected and defenseless victim of the hatred and persecution of the neighbors, without attempting to find some consolation and solace for that dread. The Ghetto-Jew finds that solace in the conception, that the non-Jew is both intellectually and morally inferior to him, that ethically the non-Jew is far below himself as he may possess superior brutal power. To this conception is added the peculiar thought, common to all peoples deprived of political power and influence, that in this world the just will always have to suffer and that the earthly powers are in the control of the wicked. Thus there has developed within the mind of the Ghetto-Jew the consciousness of a high moral superiority and of scorn of the non-Jew. The non-Jew might abuse him, insult him, even outlaw him, but his honor could not be tarnished thereby.

This amply accounts for the poorly developed sense of honor among the Eastern Jews in their dealings with the non-Jews.

Most other faults whereof the Eastern Jew is accused, are in connection with qualities of but little importance, and which have been caused to the greater extent by temporal and local conditions of life. With the elimination of these fundamental causes these objectionable features will disappear. Thus, for instance, his slovenliness, which he shares with all other groups of men, who are compelled to live under similar unfavorable economical conditions. Again his unreliability in mercantile life, as compared to the greater commercial honor ruling in Western Europe, may be attributed partly to his economic distress, partly to the general conditions prevalent in Russia where in general commercial honor is on a very low level all throughout the country. All these faults are as before stated, more of accidental origin than of inborn and ineradicable traits. With all the reproaches heaped upon the Eastern Jew on account of these faults he should also be given credit for his manifold good qualities, his lofty idealism, his strength of endurance and suffering, his frugality and his devotion. No matter how repulsive he may seem upon first acquaintance one can find under the disgusting surface a soul full of ideal emotions and of moral strength. For this reason every one fully understanding the Eastern Jews is convinced that the Central European civilization will gain a valuable additional element by their admission into the cultured circles upon a basis of equality. It will be, however, necessary to be cautious and not unduly hasten the process.

With this I have reached the essential and practical object of this discussion. We must consider the psychological effects of his emancipation upon the Eastern Jew. The facts presented in the foregoing must have convinced all, that this process of emancipation is not as easy and simple as many seem inclined to believe. The matter cannot be regulated by the mere proclamation of an ordinance or the enactment of a law. In most countries the whole problem of the Eastern Jew has heretofore been considered as a purely political question. In so doing no heed has been paid to the fact that the extrication of these Jews from their own Ghetto-world involves a psychological process of the utmost importance. This needs serious consideration and the just demands of the Jews for equality as well as the comprehensive interests of the emancipators should be safeguarded. A sudden emancipation of the Eastern Jews, which would forcibly deracinate them from their own culture and under compulsion force them immediately into the European civilization, so foreign to their own customs, would be prone to lower their moral standards and to corrupt them. That would be sure to develop among them all the psychical defects, which has been produced among the Western European Jews after their emancipation about a century ago and which have not been altogether overcome up to the present time. If so many complaints are uttered from non-Jewish quarters regarding the negative influences of the Jewish cultural activities in Western Europe, the Jew capable of objective unbiased judgment must admit that these complaints to some extent are warranted and justified. At the same time he will lay stress upon the fact that to a large measure the peoples of Western Europe themselves were at fault in suddenly releasing the Jews from their Ghetto walls and world, and planting them unprepared into the midst of European civilization. Thus the moral and psychical downfall of many became unavoidable during the earlier generations. To commit this same mistake a second time would be inexcusable. Furthermore the emancipators of the European Jewry one hundred years ago could have but little understanding of the pecularities of the Jews, for as Cosmopolitans, fanatical visionaries of human equality, they would but recognize the man in every human being. Today the intellectual situation has changed. We live in a period of the most intensively developed national idealism and to refuse to recognize their national culture and traditions to the Eastern Jews and to emancipate them only as human beings would be doing them injustice.

In order to avoid that very injustice the transition from the Ghetto into the European civilization must be accomplished by slow stages. Every hastening or compulsory measure of that transition must be carefully avoided. The emancipation must be granted without restriction or demands of counter-claims; it must establish the political and national equality without requiring the abandonment of the language or the culture. Thus only will the transition from the Ghetto into the European civilization become possible without jar and the Eastern European Jew will cast off most of his faults without jeopardizing his great psychical qualities. At the same time it seems evident beforehand that many of these good qualities will be necessarily materially weakened by the emancipation as to a considerable extent they are rooted in the Ghetto life. Then the Eastern European Jew will become a new and valuable member of the European community, to which he can contribute great things through his brilliant intellectual endowment and his untiring energies and efficiency, without at the same time exerting any baneful influences in that community as one who has been psychially deracinated.

ANTI-JEWISH RIOTS IN GALICIA.

Serious anti-Jewish riots have occurred in Cracow, Lemberg, and other towns in Galicia. Hundreds of men and women were seriously injured, and the rioters pillaged shops, stores and homes. Polish students were the ringleaders of the mobs, which were not interfered with by the authorities.

The rioting was fomented by the broadcast distribution of instigatory circulars and anti-semitic leaflets, which were handed out even in the public schools, government buildings and railroad stations.

ISAAC M. WISE

COMMANDER

By
Rabbi Morris M. Feuerlicht,
Indianapolis, Ind.

The morning's Parashah for this Sabbath is called, from its initial word, Tsav, "Command". The Rabbinic commentaries say that "tsav", "command", is here used as leshon zerus, the language of encouragement. And the Midrash, referring to this same word tsav elsewhere, makes the still broader statement: En tsivvui bechol mokom ela zerus, "The verb tsivvah has everywhere the meaning of encouragement" (Num. Rab. 7). Tsav, therefore, suggests not the ordinary imperative of command, but rather the hortative of encouragement, of urging. In both cases, obedience is desired and expected; but, while in the one it is to be forced, even against the will of him who is commanded, in the other it is to be won by persuading or encouraging the will of him who is expected to obey. The distinction is not as pedantic as it sounds. Nor is it suggestive of difference in the technic of exegesis or grammer only. It is a difference in the plain psychology of every-day human experience and human life. In other words, the difference between what we so learnedly and impressively call the imperative and hortative moods of the verb in grammar is, after all, only a technical name for precisely the same difference in actual life itself. It is the difference between force and reason; compulsion and freedom; harshness and gentleness; the letter of the law and its spirit.

A Commander.

We commemorate today the ninety-ninth anniversary of the birth and the eighteenth of the death of the immortal founder of this college and the organizer of American Judaism. However varied the perspective of pre-eminence in which he may be viewed by this the first generation since his death —whether it be in the capacity of scholar, or preacher, executive, reformer or editor —the one outstanding verdict upon which the jury of friends and critics unite is that Isaac M. Wise was a great organizer and leader. He was born to command. Doubtless that sounds commonplace . We say the same of all successful leaders in our commercial, industrial and professional life. We say it of the captain of industry, the efficiency engineer, the victorious general on the battlefield. After the success is theirs, we say, in view of more specific eulogy, they are gifted with leadership. They were born to command. But when we say that Isaac M. Wise was born to command, we say it on premises not of a priori logic, but of psychologic necessity. It was not the result that proved the man, but the man that created and proved the result. Because—En tsivvui bechol mokom ela zeruz—the success of Isaac M. Wise lay in the pre-eminently hortative rather than imperative mood of his ability to command. In that ability as in his personality, he was imperative without being imperious; dominating without being domineering; compelling without being repelling. He was forceful, but also gentle; militant, but also mild; dynamic, but also meek. And the result was that in the totality of his greatness, he was to us his followers and to contemporary American Israel kede hammetsavveh shenitstavveh, the true commander worthy of those he commanded.

Gentle Persuasion.

And as was the man, so was his work. It was the spirit and strain of zeruz, of encouragement and persuasion, rather than of compulsion, that he injected into the very heart and life of the institutions he founded. The Central Conference of American Rabbis directs and guides the religious policy of American Israel not by the imperative command of synod or hierarchic authority, but by the combined encouraging and urging influence of the Jewish devotion and Jewish loyalty and Jewish capacity of its constituent members. No congregation in American Israel has ever yet even dreamed of accepting its decisions under command or coercion, or at the cost of its own religious or liturgical autonomy. The Union of American Hebrew Congregations operates not under the duress or pressure of external or even internal command, but solely by the inherent dynamic strength of its own voluntary combination of voluntary units. To its membership any congregation professing to be an "American Jewish congregation"—to use the terminology of its organic law—is welcomed. This Hebrew Union College, favored child of the Union, most favored of the master and of his successor, our own revered and beloved Dr. Kohler, sends forth its graduates in no straightjacket of an inflexibly fixed and predetermined interpretation of our ancestral faith. No man leaves these halls with the enforced label of reform or orthodox, conservative, liberal, Zionist or anti-Zionist. To be sure, there is Tendenz, or Richtung; there is tsav, command, an angle of inclination, and line of direction; but it is a line and angle not of compulsion, but of propulsion: En tsivvui bechol mokom ela zerus. The tsivvui of this College, like that of the exegetics and hermeneutics of the Fathers, is the command not of the absolute imperative, but of hortative encouragement.

Spirit of American Judaism.

And that, too, is the spirit of American Judaism. Indeed, it is precisely because of that spirit, that we insist on designating it as American. There has lately grown among us a certain sensitiveness almost to the point of squeamishness on the subject of adjectives used to qualify our varying shades of Judaism. There is a feeling abroad that the use of "reform", "orthodox", 'conservative", "progressive" and the like be discouraged. Names are, after all, only labels; and labels are but libels, it is frequently urged. And Judaism being Judaism, why not be content to let it remain a plain and unadjectived Judaism? And yet, commendable enough though the motive of that sensitiveness is, we persist in calling our Judaism, American, because in that precise term there is intended and symboled that very comprehensiveness and unity at which the desire for a plain and unadjectived Judaism aims.

To Isaac M. Wise, as to us today, America was not a mere geographic patch of earth; nor a selfish economic opportunity; nor even a mighty political unit. It was, uniquely among the nations, a thing of the spirit, an ideal, a philosophy-political in its form, but in its essence so spiritual that it not only fitted in with the genius of the unadjectived Judaism of the ages, but it also provided the first real and unhampered opportunity which that Judaism had had to unfold itself in all the flower and grandeur of its spiritual and moral idealism. The Jew, having been the first among surviving groups to nationalize religion, was now in America free not only to internationalize religion, but also to religionize not merely nationalism, but internationalism as well. And whatever the original motive that inspired reform — whether it was philosophic in its protest against the princples and practices of orthodox or traditional Judaism, or only esthetic in its complaint against the indecorousness of synagog worship—to Isaac M. Wise it was a protest primarily based on more purely psychological grounds. For Isaac M. Wise, as every one familiar with his biography knows—was a revolutionary by nature. He was impatient of external force; of mechanical restraint; of artificial authority. When he left his native home, he turned his back upon the Old World forever. With all the zeal of the ancient Nazarite, he vowed never again to return to see it even from sentimental motives of recreation or pleasure. But, revolutionary though he was and impatient of authority and restraint, it was not the impatience of Dathan and Abiram, of the sons of Belial, or of the Bolsheviki. He wanted tsav, or tsivvui; he wanted Judaism forever to continue to command. But: En tsivvui bechol mokom ela zeruz, it must be the command that wins the devotion of him who is commanded, not by some inflexible imperative from without, but by encouragement and urging from within. He believed that God himself wanted none other. Hakkol bide shamayim chuts miyirath shamayim: "Everything is in the power of God save only the fear of God". He knew that God himself was so jealous of the voluntary obedience of man, that He deliberately waived His omnipotence even though in this one respect it made man more omnipotent than omnipotence itself.

Isaac M. Wise, moreover, knew that although there had been and doubtless always would be psychologically parallel lines of orthodoxy and reform, of conservatism and progressivism in Judaism; yet—as was so effectively and historically recalled at the dedication of these, our present College buildings—once upon a time it was similarly said of corresponding lines in Israel: Elu ve-elu divre elohim chayyim. "Both indeed uttered the words of the living God"; but, in the ultimate test, in the practical religious life of Israel, it seemed to be the genius of Judaism to decide that the Bath Kol descended upon the side of zeruz, of gentle encouragement rather than harsh command.

Its Message in the Great War.

And so, Isaac M. Wise preferred to speak of American Judaism above any other qualifying kind of Judaism. The adjective was for him—as it is for us—no hyphenated exotic; it was, despite the anachronism. indigenous and native to Judaism. He brought into being, therefore, a General Conference not of Reform, but American Rabbis; a Union not of Reform, but American Congregations; and he constantly wrote and spoke, not of the Reform or Orthodox, but the American Jew. And so, too, in his spirit and logic, do we today continue to speak. Ah, how invigorating and refreshing to read once more his always interesting "Reminiscences" in the light of the present war. How exhilarating to sense the stimulating nobility and purity of his vision of America, his and our America, the America in which he visualized the fullest flowering of that Judaism for which he and all the prophets of Israel before him had yearned. That America is now at war. We speak of it as a war against Prussianism, junkerism, militarism, and a host of isms to which in theory and in fact we of America are and fundamentally and forever must be opposed. But, in its essential psychology behind even its philosophy, does it not (after all) resolve itself whether in government or in life into the simple, clear and world-old struggle between tsivvui, the imperative that would command obedience by force and the zerus the imperative that would command it by encouragement; between compulsion and freedom; between duress and liberty? And have we any doubt how mightily the voice of Isaac M. Wise, the commander, would today repeat the ancient word: En tsivvui bechol mohom ela zeruz?

Dr. Wise's Vision.

Some among us still vividly remember the remarkable prediction he made in the class room not long before his passing. "In fifty years", said he, "Judaism will be the world's religion"! And how we are startled by the bold visionary way in which he said it. Some twenty years have since passed; and we are wondering, asking in view of the tremendous spiritual and religious upheaval already stirred by this war, was it not the voice of the true prophet speaking? Did not Isaac M. Wise speak with the prophetic power and instinct of a Jacob foreseeing Shiloh?

You recall the many beautiful and poetic legends which the Midrash tells about the Creation. There is one that must have been conceived in a time just such as this. When God was about to create man, we are told that with modesty becoming even to the Divine, He called his ministering angels into consultation. Accordingly, Mercy, Peace, Justice and Truth gathered around the heavenly throne. They argued, pro and con, the wisdom of God's intention. First spoke Mercy—always positive and always affirmative rather than negative in the great questions of life: "Do Thou create man, O God; for I will plant pity in his heart". But Peace opposed his creation: "Do not create man", said Peace "for man will be quarrelsome. He will bring war into the world". To this Justice interposed: "But am not I here? Behold, I will give him laws of justice whereby he shall be ruled". Finally, said Truth in opposition: "Do not make man, O God; for with man, all will be lies and vanity in the world". Whereupon, accepting this as a challenge, God took Truth and cast him down to earth. The rest, astonished by such treatment of their comrade, remonstrated: "Why dost Thou thus contemptuously cast Truth to earth; is not Truth Thy seal"? And God answered: "When man will diligently walk in the way of truth, and will learn to love it with all his heart and his soul, Emes Me-erets Tatsmiach. Truth, cast to earth, shall rise again".

True Religion Still Lives.

Ah, no; despite the lamentations of dogmatists and theologians outside of Judaism when this war began, true religion is not dead. When the thunders roar; and the lightnings flash; when shell and shrapnel are crashing about their heads in trench and dugout of the far-flung battle-line, it is the testimony of expert psychology as well as of actual experience, men do not turn away from God, but towards Him. They thirst for Him more than does the hart after the refreshing water-brook. Yea, they watch for Him, more than they that watch for the morning. They pray as they have never prayed before, and say:

Whither shall I go from Thy spirit;
And whither shall I flee from Thy presence?
If I ascend up into heaven, behold, Thou art there;
And if I make my bed in the nether world, Thou too art there.
And if I take the wings of the morning,
And fly to the uttermost parts of the sea,
Even there would Thy hand lead me,
And Thy right hand would hold me.
And if I say lo, the darkness shall cover me,
And the light about me shall be as the night;
Ah, even the darkness is not too dark for Thee,
But the night shineth as the day,
And the light is even as the night.

I quote the Psalmist in extenso because, in my humble view, I have been able to find nothing in all our copious war-literature so marvelously and so hauntingly true in its poetic expression of the intelligent man's attitude towards true religion and its relation to the war. The war is not the refutation of true religion, but its challenge. It is not the proof of religion's failure, but its test— the most revolutionary it has undergone in history. Ever since this war began, novelists, dramatists, philosophers, thinking men the world over have been searching and groping and yearning for new conceptions of God. They are seeing what for them are new visions of Him. And, all the while, unconsciously, unintentionally perhaps, but none [illegible] definitely, these conceptions [illegible] visions are those of the God of [illegible] are approaching the fulfillment [illegible] prophetic word of Isaac M. Wise's [illegible]ing in his characteristic way the vision of the Psalmist: "This is the generation of those that seek Thee, those that seek Thy face, O God of Jacob".

Fulfillment.

This is the heartening word which this our feeble, but ever reverent and grateful, memorial of Isaac M. Wise brings back today. This Sabbath is liturgically known as Shabbath Habbadol, the Great Sabbath. We need no reminder, of course, of the fact that with the single exception of the Sabbath of Sabbaths, every Sabbath in Judaism is a great Sabbath. And yet, our fathers nominally magnified this Sabbath above the rest because it comes closest to Israel's great festival of freedom. By virtue of that proximity, it symbolled for them the advent of the day when freedom of the body would be blended with freedom of the spirit. How much the greater, then, for us and for American Israel does this Sabbath become by reason of its coincidence with the birth and death anniversary of the freedom-loving prophet of Americanism and Judaism! Above the roar and tumult of the universal battle, we still hear the resonant, but gentle and urging voice of Isaac M. Wise, commander of American Israel: Tsav! In Judaism as in Americanism, in this war as in life, command is indispensable; but En tsivvui bechol mohom ela zeruz, the "command" must everywhere have the meaning of encouragement or urging, if it is to be worthy of obedience in the sight of God and man.

On this great and greater Sabbath coming in the midst of this greatest of wars may that word hold for us and for the world the promise of an early and victorious fulfillment, so that though once in a kindred time it was said: "Apres nous le deluge"! we may shortly be enabled to say, Apres le deluge—nous! Amen.

ANNUAL MEETING OF JEWISH PUBLICATION SOCIETY.

The 30th annual meeting of the Jewish Publication Society was held on Sunday afternoon, March 24, 1918, at the Dropsie College, Philadelphia. The meeting was opened with prayer by Rabbi Samuel Friedman, after which President Simon Miller read his report on the society's progress during the last year. His report was followed with report of the treasurer, Henry Fernberger.

A painting of Dr. Cyrus Adler, president of the Dropsie College, was presented to the society by his colleagues. The presentation was made by President Miller in an address in which the services of Dr. Adler to the Jewish community were outlined.

Two admirable and timely papers were read, one by the president, Simon Miller, and the other by Chester J. Teller, of New York, managing director of the Jewish board for welfare work among soldiers and sailors.

The committee on nominations submitted the following recommendations for officers, who were unanimously elected:

President, one year — Simon Miller, Philadelphia.

First vice-president — Hon. Abram I. Elkus, New York.

Second vice-president, one year—Horace Stern, Philadelphia.

Trustees, three years — Henry Fernberger, Philadelphia; Joseph Hagedorn, Philadelphia; S. Charles Lampert, New York; Horace Stern, Philadelphia; Samuel Strauss, New York; Hon. Seligman J. Strauss, Wilkes-Barre, Pa.; Cyrus L. Sulzberger, New York.

Trustee, two years—Hon. Abram I. Elkus, New York.

Honorary vice-presidents, three years—Isaac W. Bernheim, Louisville; S. W. Jacobs, Montreal; Louis E. Kirstein, Boston; Hon. Julian W. Mack, Chicago; Hon. Simon Wolf, Washington, D. C.

ANTI-JEWISH AGITATION IN POLAND.

The Jewish Press Bureau in Stockholm communicates:

The Jewish Press in Poland pays much attention to the growing anti-Jewish agitation in Poland. Especially is it noticeable in the provinces of the Austrian occupation where special unions are formed with the purpose of preventing the Poles from selling landed property to Jews. Those Poles who would not submit to this propaganda are threatened with the publication of black lists with their names.

A JEWISH GOVERNOR-GENERAL FOR MADAGASCAR.

M. Abraham Schrameck, who, since 1910, has been prefect of the Bouches-du-Rhone, has been appointed governor-general of Madagascar and its dependencies. Mr. Schrameck has for a goodly number of years held administrative offices.

THE FAITH OF THE JEW

By Dr. Max L. Margolis

Written for the B'nai B'rith News

In the present writer's student days it used to be said that there were all told two Jewish theologians in the world, one of whom lived at Cambridge, England and the other in New York. Then the Cambridge scholar transferred his activities to New York and the New York scholar to Cincinnati. Now that Schechter has passed away, Kohler remains in sole possession of the field. Is it possible, the reader will ask, that there is such a scarcity of masters of Jewish theology? Yes, if by Jewish theology we understand a competent, all around presentation and defense of the Jewish faith. Rabbis are not necessarily theologians, though every one of them must necessarily undergo a theological training. The rabbi's work is mainly practical. That is no disparagement of the office. To write sermons and to lead a congregation is no easy task, far more difficult perhaps than the writing of a book. Those again who write books among the Jewish scholars naturally pursue some investigation which is connected with Jew and Judaism, but their work is remote from theology. It ought not to be surprising. It is the same in other branches of learning, especially when they have a practical side. The Lord Kelvins are few, though every teacher in high school gives instruction in physics, though every electrician may know the rudiments of his trade. The man who sums up the teachings of the Jewish religion must be at home, it is true, in Jewish literature and must have looked about in contiguous subjects; he certainly cannot refute paganism and Christianity and Mohammedanism without a knowledge of those systems; he must be schooled in gauging the measure of various religions and of comprehending the basic principle of religion in general; he must have familiarized himself with speculations going by the name of philosophy of all times, ancient and modern, he will quote Anselm and Bergson; but above all he must know how to discriminate between the essential and unessential, the fundamental and the corollary. Moreover, it requires a long apprenticeship; for the material must be gathered at long range, and the digestion of it requires continued thought.

Both Schechter and Kohler had been signally prepared for the task they undertook. The one, it is true, cultivated the field of rabbinic theology; the other the entire field. The narrower field naturally afforded more room for creative work; in a comprehensive treatment the individual contributions are apt to be submerged. Schechter excelled in a style peculiarly his own; epigrammatic, trenchant, telling, polemical. Not that Kohler is by nature pacific. He can be a fighter when the need arises. But the character of a text-book lends itself rather to calm presentation and encourages a style perspicuous, clear and less scintillating. Still Kohler is the born preacher, and he rises to the height of persuasive eloquence when he vindicates the Jewish position against other syystems of belief or the specific merits of what he calls progressive Judaism against Orthodoxy and Nationalism. And be it said that, while his polemics against political Zionism have lost nothing of their wonted sharpness, he strives to do justice to the orthodox position. He is deferential to tradition, he adopts even a reverent tone in discussing it. All these are great merits in a work naturally meritorious. I am referring to his work on Jewish Theology, first written in German and now recast in English. Let me also add that while the work addresses itself to the needs of the student, the layman will find that the diction is plain and pleasing enough to merit his attention.

The comparison between Kohler and Schechter, widely as they stood apart in the conception of Judaism as well as in their mental habits of thought, goes still further. It is in the nature of a comprehensive treatment that it is more systematic. Still Kohler, no less than Schechter, is above all an historian. He treats his subject historically. He shows how the beliefs arose and developed. The speculative part is relegated to the background. That may be a defect as well as a merit. Considering the daily reiterated onslaughts on the citadel of faith in God, perhaps a philosophic foundation might have been attempted. Still what we wish to know first and foremost is what the beliefs of Judaism actually have been and still are. For no religion can exist without implying doctrines. The Christians have their fixed dogmas. Dogmas in the Christian sense we do not possess. Membership in the Jewish community is not conditioned by avowed acceptance of articles of faith. Still it is erroneous to say that they are not passively acquiesced in, tacitly accepted. Indeed, so long as a direct denial of a Jewish position is not made, it must be taken for granted that a Jew believes what other Jews hold as sacred fundamental teachings. The theologian takes stock, as it were, of his people's spiritual possessions. No more and no less.

There is little in Kohler's delineation of our ancestral faith that a judicious critic will take exception to. The thread that runs through the entire work is, to be sure, the progressive or liberal attitude. Every chapter issues into the present-day position of Reform Judaism. But after all the part contributed in a hundred years of development cannot be so formidable when it comes to describe a faith whose life is measured by the thousands of years. Leave out the Reform appendage, and there remains a good body of doctrine upon which all Jews will find themselves in agreement. The persistence of the Jew in the world is after all is said and written the main theme of any work dealing with the faith of the Jew. Now, whether Orthodoxy patiently waits for the millennial redemption through a personal Messiah, or whether Reform looks forward to the reign of peace in the millennial Messianic times, both agree that the Jewish people must remain steadfast to the end. Scientific method consists in acknowledging the fact and then in reasoning about it. The fact in the case is the will to live on the part of the Jewish people. Now much fun has been poked at those who say that the Jewish people should be maintained, not suffered to die out, for biological reasons. Biology is a science, and so is theology. Biology states the facts in terms of nature, theology in terms of reason and history. The religionist spiritualizes the simple fact patent to every Jew that we want the Jewish people to live on. Religion is indeed nothing but the spiritual interpretation, the hallowing of matter of fact experience. Individual Jews may have a different way for dealing with the fundamental fact, the persistence of the Jew in the past, and the hope that he will abide further. Leave the biological position, bald as it may seem, to the naturalist, and the nationalist platform to the Zionist. That should not preclude the theologian from discovering the reason and the purpose. The world is with us as a fact. The naturalist will dissect it at his pleasure, the politician will divide it as is his wont, still the man of faith will find a purpose in it, he will indeed find God in nature and in history. And so the theologian will find a purpose in Israel's world. If Israel's purpose is to teach mankind, it matters not; after all, humanity cannot be taught unless the appointed teacher lives on.

I have singled out this point out of a good many in Kohler's mature work, because after all it is the one in which we laymen have the profoundest interest. The enemies of the Jewish people have in turn intimidated and cajoled us to swerve from the path of our ancestors, from the way of the Jewish life. If we but give up our hope, no one cares what our faith be. And yet hope is footed in faith. And the supreme article of our faith is the belief that we are God's elect people. What matters it if some believe that we ought to stay dispersed, or if others aver that we should build a national state in Palestine? What does matter is that we do not die out. The One God cannot be the God of the dead but of the living. So said he whom Christians know as their master. If witnesses we are to be, we must be living witnesses. Judaism cannot be detached from the Jew. Just imagine the Jewish people no more and Judaism a matter of the antiquary, consigned to a museum instead of to a living community held together by traditions, here or in Palestine. Judaism as a living influence would be dead. There is no danger that Jewish life in Palestine will be divorced from tradition, aye, from the traditions that have grown about it in the long centuries of dispersion. No nation begins with a clean slate. The liberal Jew ought to be the first to enlist among the re-builders of Zion. There alone Jewish endeavor will be linked to the classic past, to the iconoclasm of the prophets, perhaps even to the utopias of the law-givers. There the Jew will be free to live his own life, to remodel the ancient forms in conformity with the world's stage of culture, even as in ancient days Torah and prophecy were in touch with the world-movement of those remote days. Palestinian Judaism will be in the world no less than American. Kohler has not thought it fit to recast a previous rather naive hope that the Jew in Mohammedan countries may even at some time observe Friday as is done by the Mosque, and accordingly consecrate this day in common with his fellow-citizens. He does not give up the historical Jewish Sabbath, which is somewhat to be sandwiched in between the Christian Sunday and the Mohammedan Friday as a sort of historical reminiscence, yet also as the symbol of a hope that our ancient Sabbath may truly become the Sabbath of the world. We will not quarrel with the position. Only let us reason a bit. The necessity of observing a supplementary day of rest arises from the environment. Now, suppose for a moment that the Jewish state is realized and the Palestinian environment will do away with all supplementation, in other words the Jewish Sabbath comes into its own, would it not be far more logical to hope that the Jewish Sabbath, instead of figuring as a shadowy reminiscence, will be endowed with new life and once more become a living institution in Israel, at once a symbol of the past as well as of the future? Liberal Judaism cannot desire the ancient Sabbath with all its multitudinous restrictions which really were designed for the conditions of the dispersion. In Palestine alone the Sabbath can be truly liberalized without detriment to the institution and to the faith of which it is a symbol.

A theology we need, that is a reasoned summary of what every Jew cherishes as sacred belief. A liberal theology we need likewise, for all religions must make peace with the culture of the age. But liberalism does not mean stagnation. Reform is grounded in emancipation, in the emancipation of the individual Jew, in his integration into national aggregates. The future will not abolish the dispersion, even as it persisted in Greek and Roman times and still higher up. But the Jew may just as well be integrated into a nationality of his own. This must be the position of the revised liberal creed of the future. It is at once the fundamental mark of Orthodoxy. And the Zionist, who is not a materialist, will not be found far away. Let us not deny a scholar so learned as Kohler the right to his own opinions. But after all he has aimed higher. His work, I take it, may be the guide of all Jews. His theology will be found a useful meeting ground for all our factions, the nationalist included. The book will find readers in Jerusalem as well as in Cincinnati or New York. And may Dr. Kohler, rich in years and well-deserved honors, be spared for many years to witness the resurrection of the Jewish state of Palestine, where the Judaism he loves and upholds may renew its strength as the eagle and become a power in the world, that the teachings of the Jewish faith may become the possession of all humanity, that strife and war may disappear from the earth and everywhere, even as in Palestinian Judea a man may live in security under his fig and vine trees, and all the states and principalities of the world pattern themselves after the community on Mount Zion. And with this Jewish blessing we close.

BOLSHEVIK GOVERNMENT HOSTILE TO JEWISH CONGRESS.

Because over 50 per cent of the delegates elected to the contemplated Jewish Congress in Russia were Zionists, the Bolshevik government announced that it would receive no better treatment than was accorded to the Ukraine Rada. At the same time, according to advices received by the Provisional Zionist Committee, it announced that it would assume the same attitude toward the Jewish Communal Councils which are also anti-Bolshevik in character. In answer to direct inquiries, the present Russian government made it plain that it would permit only an assembly favorable to its rule. It was therefore decided to postpone the Jewish Congress indefinitely and to set up a National Provisional Council from among the Jewish leaders of all parties, proportionately to their strength as demonstrated at the polls and to charge this council with the task of defending Jewish interests. Based on the election returns for the Jewish Congress the Council will have a Zionist majority. In addition to the "straight-out" Zionist majority, the Socialist-Zionists elected 7 per cent. Sixteen per cent were elected by the Bundists and Unified Socialists, and the remainder were distributed among the Orthodox, Democratic and other groupings.

Among the nine men who will represent Harvard University in the annual triangular debate with Yale and Princeton, are the following Jewish boys: Jacob J. Tutun, '20; W. Hettleman, '19; J. Davis, '19; L. L. Levy, '20; H. Berlack, '20, and H. A. Janzlick, '20.

JEWISH WELFARE BOARD—U. S. ARMY AND NAVY.

The Jewish Welfare Board—U. S. Army and Navy, has just completed a canvass of the navy and has obtained from the commanders of the destroyers, battleships, submarine chasers and other naval ships, and from those in charge of the land stations, the needs of the Jewish men in the service

Where the men of Jewish faith are aboard ships, the Jewish Welfare Board has enlisted the aid of the navy chaplains. They, in turn, have organized committees of Jewish men. These committees communicate with the Welfare Board, informing it of the wants of the men.

The Jewish Welfare Board estimates, from the figures it has at hand, that there are between 4,000 and 5,000 Jewish men in the naval service in the United States. The Board has been in touch with approximately 3,000 men on board ships and naval stations, supplying to these men prayer books, bibles and stationery. The Jewish chaplain has already been commissioned by the War Department, —Chaplain David Goldberg. Chaplain Goldberg was assigned to the U. S. S. Grant. He is the only chaplain on board that ship and is in charge of all religious and recreational activities. At his request, the Jewish Welfare Board completely outfitted the mess room of the U. S. S. Grant, with stationery, games, puzzles, magazines, books, victrola records, pens, pencils, ink, in addition to bibles and prayer books.

It is also announced by the Board that through its committee on overseas activities, of which Dr. DeSola Pool is chairman, a cable has been received from Chaplain Voorsanger, with the American Expeditionary Forces in France, stating that he had no especial needs to report and requested suggestions by the Board as to what it is prepared to do for the Jewish soldiers fighting in France. The Committee at once convened and decided to send a commission of one, two or possibly three members to France, one member of the commission to conduct the overseas work, the other member or members to return with their findings and recommendations. The Committee also favored sending from three to five men as assistants to the commission, who would remain in France to conduct and develop the work.

Colonel Harry Cutler, the Board's chairman, makes also the very important announcement that the negotiations with the Independent Order B'nai Brith, for affiliation with the Board, have finally been successfully concluded, and the Board has notified the I. O. B. B. that the new relationship became effective on April 1. From that date, the Welfare Board is to receive from the I. O. B. B. one of the largest Jewish fraternal organizations, all cash and other assets collected for Welfare work and the Welfare Board henceforth will assume all obligations and liabilities of the Fraternal Order in relation to this work.

POGROMS IN TURKESTAN AND UKRAINE.

Confirmation of the Jewish massacres in Turkestan, which have spread to Ukraine, have been received by the Provisional Zionist Committee from its correspondents in Petrograd and Copenhagen.

In Kokanda, Turkestan, 300 Jews were murdered and thousands plundered. Murders and robberies occured in all the small towns of the province. Among the victims is the Minister of Finance of the Turkestan Government, Herzfeld, who was also the chairman of the Turkestan Zionist Committee.

In Gluchow, a town in the Ukraine, almost the entire Jewish population was exterminated.

The situation is growing more desperate momentarily, and relief committees are being organized.

SHANGHAI AND PALESTINE.

The Jewish Community of Shanghai, China, has voted to erect 100 cottages at a cost of 50 pounds sterling each, to house 100 Jewish families in Palestine, as its contribution toward the Restoration Fund. The Jewish communities of Hong Kong and Singapore have been asked to co-operate in the interests of the Fund, and Mr. N. E. B. Ezra has reason to believe that these two far-distant Jewish centers will rise to the great occasion.

A strong effort is being made to secure the official approval by Japan and China, of the British declaration in favor of a Jewish National homeland in Palestine. Mr. David Sandelso, of Tsingtao, Japan, has succeeded in interesting Viscount Inouye, a member of the Japanese House of Peers, and reports that all the Chinese statesmen are sympathetic.

Not unless we fill our existence with an aim do we make it life.—Reichel.

NEWS FROM LONDON

By Our Correspondent Dr. M. Epstein

London, 18th March, 1918.

With the approach of the Passover the usual domestic preparations are in full swing, and the food problem will this year, probably all over the world, present its special difficulties. But the Jewish ecclesiastical authorites here have taken special steps to get recognized the particular needs of the Jews on this occasion, and the ministry of food has met the demands with cordiality. There is therefore no prospect of a lack of Passover provisions, though it need hardly be added that they will fall within the existing frame-work of the food supply. It is a curious phenomenon, this attachment of the Jew to the Passover fare. Soldiers who give little thought to their Jewishness all the year round evince a remarkable anxiety about matzas, and on the other hand good folk who minister to the needs of the warriors always include a supply of matzas as part of their scheme. So it is here. So it is in allied countries; so it is with the enemy. But then a custom with so long a history cannot but have a firm hold on the race which has practised it.

Yet, after all, this is but a minor problem. Passover is soon ended and will be with us again next year. But the upheavals of the war have left permanent traces on the whole of Europe, Jewry included, and there is great need for a wise policy of reconstruction. One fact, to which indeed attention has been called, is that the revolution in Russia may have consequences for the Jewries of Western Europe and America. Hitherto, the free democracies of the West have had a constant stream of Jewish emigrants from darkest Russia, all bent on finding liberty of conscience for themselves and their children. They came to England and the States bringing with them a religious atmosphere of their own to which they clung and which they strove to develop. The East Side of New York, as the East End of London, bears witness to this tendency; the Chevras, Hebrew Schools, Yiddish newspapers and theaters, the aspect of the streets on Friday evenings with the Sabbath candles visible through the curtains or the blinds—all these are tangible signs of the Russian, Rumanian or Galician "atmospheres". You could find them in London, Leeds, Manchester, as doubtless also in New York or Philadelphia France was less affected in this respect, and the "Kehilla" in Paris was insignificant in numbers and influence. Germany was hardly affected at all; these people did not come to Germany because they found no freedom there. Wherever they settled they were exotics, dreamers in a land of prose, a state within a state. But they were the stuff of which splendid citizens are made, and they and their children were devoted to learning. They were still the People of the Book—or of books. They kept burning the light of Jewish knowledge; from their ranks the great mass of the ministers were drawn. While in America they existed side by side with what may be termed a specifically American Jewish outlook, in England they have gradually tended to dominate the communal horizon. A specifically Anglo-Jewish outlook hardly exists, in the sense that a Polish, South German or even French Jewish outlook exists. In Poland, in South Germany, in France, there has been a long Jewish tradition. The Jewish tradition in England has been no robust plant. Possibly the Sephardim, or Spanish wing of the community, have a character of their own. But their congregation is feeble and their influence hardly extensive. The United Synagogue, the special Jewish organization in London on the religious side, has no character in this sense, and little of a tradition. It lays stress on the wrong points. It has no ideals beyond being solvent, and the criticism of it, made long ago, that it was a glorified burial society still holds good. It buries not only Jews but also Judaism.

In these circumstances it was not to be wondered at that as the Jewish immigrants from Eastern Europe increased in numbers, they gradually made their influence felt. Religious education received an impetus; and it was a red-letter day in the history of Anglo-Jewry when representatives of the "English" wing and those of their Russian brethren met together to consult on the future of Jewish education in this country. Zionism made headway; Hebrew as a living language was widely cultivated. The Synagogues also in the process of time enhibited this type of "foreign" Jew. In a word, the new influences began to make themselves felt, and the English Jews of ancient lineage saw their hegomony threatened. Hence the League of British Jews, which is making determined efforts to retain its hold on the community. The sudden fear of the leaders of the League is a pitiful thing. They repeat, what no one challenges, that they are British and that England is their home. It is a curious fact that the Central Association of German citizens of the Jewish faith recently trumpeted forth a similar creed. "Not Zion, but Germany, is the land of their yearning", declared the president of the Central Association above mentioned. Such a sentiment is intelligible in Germany where the state knows only one type of citizenship—namely, German. All have to be cast in the same mould, and must have the same outlook. In the British commonwealth there is room for many types and many outlooks. The Hindus and Mohammedans of India and the Protestant communities of Scotland (to take but a simple illustration) are equally British citizens. Why then do the British Jewish Leaguers rage? Why are they so insistent on their British citizenship? It is difficult to account for the movement except on the theory that it is the result of panic. In any case, it does not appear to have made a strong hit, and while it numbers many distinguished Jews among its leaders, it is significant that there are many other distinguished Jews whose names are absent.

What a topsy-turvy world it is in which we are living! While the League of British Jews passionately proclaims its British citizenship, fearful lest anyone should come to throw doubt on it, the new republic in Eastern Europe has actually appointed ministers for Jewish affairs. In the Ukraine, the new minister is Dr. Moses Silberfarb, and his appointment must make the protectors and benefactors of Ukrainia feel somewhat uncomfortable. On February 29th, 1904—just over fourteen years ago—two Russian students were expelled from Germany for their alleged revolutionary views. "We have not yet reached that stage in Germany", Prince Bulow, who was then Imperial Chancellor, told the German Reichstag, "when Schnorrers and plotters of this character may do as they like". One of these plotters and schnorrers was this same Silberfarb. Today he holds a portfolio in the Cabinet of one of the new republics of Europe; while Prince Bulow has had three successors and is himself on the shelf.

The Palestine Commission duly left England for the Holy Land, and before its departure the king saw its president, Dr. Chaim Weizmann. His majesty, we are credibly informed, showed a very real interest in Palestine; and General Smuts on his return thence is enthusiastic. "I stood on the Mount of Olives", he remarked, "and the vista was so beautiful that I can well understand that this country should have produced prophets and seers". General Smuts is a man of keen insight, and his opinion is therefore valuable. Meantime the Jewish regiment has arrived in Cairo, where, marching through the streets, it received a welcome as warm-hearted as London's. It is stated that its members will be considerably increased in Egypt since a goodly band of volunteers are waiting there to be enrolled in its ranks. In England the reserves are growing apace, and the Jewish warriors in Palestine bid fair in due course to grow into an exceedingly great army.

Sir Lionel Abraham's paper before the London Lodge was a fine achievement. It was one of these rare lectures which do not end with interesting those who listen to it, but which carry their influence beyond. It is hoped that his attempt at mediation between the extreme wings of the Anglo-Jewish community may lead to an agreement. It is particularly pleasing that the Lodge should have been the forum for this attempt, for the Lodge prides itself on its middle position in the community. It contans men of all shades of thought and schools of opinion. In the Lodge they find a common meeting ground where their Jewishness is uppermost.

A body of this character was needed in Anglo-Jewry before the war; after the war the need for it will be greater than ever. The reconstruction of the Anglo-Jewish community will call for the co-operation of all available forces. In the London Lodge (and in others which it may be possible to found when the war is over), a fitting meeting place will be provided, to the glory of the Order and to the benefit of Israel.

SPEECH BY HERBERT HOOVER

U. S. Food Administrator, at Meeting of Hotel Men, New Milford Hotel, Washington, D. C., March 29, 1918

Ladies and Gentlemen. We have asked you to come, many of you, on a long journey, with great sacrifice to yourselves. We have not asked you to come for any idle purpose. Unfortunately, you meet us at probably the most serious day in our national history since the Battle of Gettysburg. The seriousness of the situation can only emphasize the problem which we wish to put before you.

The Food Administration has not taken the attitude of the general in command giving orders. Our attitude to the American public has been consistent, that we should ask for service, that we should ask for self-sacrifice, that we should tell in a clear and direct way the why and wherefore of every request. It is due to you to say that I should tell you first the why and wherefore of your coming, because of the request that I am going to make of you.

Our wheat situation is today the most serious situation in the food supply of the whole allied world. We have had a stock taking in the early days of March and we find that our harvest was less than it was estimated. There is also another and more bitter difficulty in the delays of shipping, in the growing scarcity of ships, that has thrown a larger burden upon the American people in feeding the Allies than we had anticipated. We had all expected that the Argentine supply would be available in Europe before this time. Those supplies will not arrive for another two months in quantity, and even then will be less than we had expected. The consequence is that the supply of breadstuffs in Europe is at its lowest ebb. There is but one source of supply and that is the United States.

Today our investigation shows that if we are to ship to the Allies the amount that is necessary to carry over, even the minimum of the bread supply, to their people, we must cut our own consumption by one-half. The limit that we propose on allied shipment is simply the limit of our exporting power. It may eventuate that we must reduce the bread consumption of the United States more than one-half. We intend to ship the bread supply from here, willy nilly, but it is not a simple problem of taking breadstuffs from the people.

Every shipment of grain,—every shipment of wheat,—that we can send from our ports, is a shipment saved from the Argentine. Every ship can do double the duty from our ports that it can do from the Argentine. Every time that we send a shipment, we save two ships from the Argentine. Every time we save a ship we save building a ship. Every time we save a ship we save the transport and the supply of one regiment of American soldiers. The Allies, within the last few days, have asked us to send reinforcements, larger and faster than we had anticipated. I assure you that if we are to give them that we must draw these ships from the Argentine and put them into American ports.
